

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

A 860,214

1019

3177

GREEK LIFE AND THOUGHT

30235

GREEK LIFE AND THOUGHT

FROM THE AGE OF ALEXANDER TO THE ROMAN CONQUEST

BY

J. P. MAHAFFY

FELLOW ETC. OF TRINITY COLLEGE, DUBLIN; HON. FELLOW OF QUEEN'S COLLEGE, OXFORD; KNIGHT OF THE ORDER OF THE REDEEMER;

AUTHOR OF

'PROLEGOMENA TO ANCIENT HISTORY'; 'KANT'S PHILOSOPHY FOR ENGLISH READERS';
'SOCIAL LIFE IN GREECE'; 'RAMBLES AND STUDIES IN GREECE';
'A HISTORY OF GREEK LITERATURE,' ETC.

London
MACMILLAN AND CO.
AND NEW YORK

1887

All rights reserved

AMICO
EDGARDO VINCENT
AMICUS AUCTOR

P R E F A C E

THIS book is intended as the natural sequel to my Social Life in Greece from Homer to Menander, which is now before the public in its fifth edition. The new title I had at first adopted was accordingly Social Life in Greece from Menander to Polybius, but, as the work grew, I found it necessary to modify considerably the original plan. For, in the first ~~book I had intended to treat of the conquests of Alexander~~

E R R A T A

P. 251, last line, for 'Catullus,' read 'Ovid.'

P. 462, lines 11-13, read 'over one hundred miles from the Euphrates and the Cilician gates, and still more remote from the Black Sea.'

.

P R E F A C E

THIS book is intended as the natural sequel to my Social Life in Greece from Homer to Menander, which is now before the public in its fifth edition. The new title I had at first adopted was accordingly Social Life in Greece from Menander to Polybius, but, as the work grew, I found it necessary to modify considerably the original plan. For, in the first place, Greek life after the conquests of Alexander extends far beyond the bounds of Greece, and its most interesting phases are in Syria and Egypt.

In Greek Life and Thought I mean, therefore, to include all the life of Greek-born, or Greek-speaking, people, wherever they dwelt. Perhaps I should have called it Hellenistic Life and Thought, but the proper force of that adjective, as distinct from Hellenic, requires explanation ; and, moreover, the book does not exclude later Hellenedom, or strictly Greek society, as distinguished from the Hellenism of foreigners, such as Jews or Bactrians. Indeed, the Hellenism of the last of these is still too obscure and uncertain to find a place in a volume like this, which rather sets down results than processes of investigation.

In the second place, as this book was not intended exclusively for scholars, it became necessary to introduce some account of the history and literature of the age as the background for the estimate of life and manners, which is my main object. I might possibly have assumed a knowledge of this history and literature in the scholar, though, even for scholars, the epoch is one of great complication and obscurity, lying outside the bounds of ordinary classical reading; but, from the general reader, this special knowledge could not possibly be expected. Hence there is more actual history in the present volume than in its predecessor, and its limits are marked, not by great authors, but by great political events.

So much I may preface in vindication of the title. Those who desire a compendious review of the events of the period over which we are about to travel will now find it in my Story of Alexander's Empire (F. Unwin, 1887), where the main facts and dates are set down with some brief hints of the topics expanded in the present volume. At the same time I have added a chronological table to this volume.¹ There remains yet a third portion of the same great subject still untouched—the Spiritual life of Hellenism under the Roman Empire.

An author has no right to make apologies for a work which he offers to the public. Yet, it is fair to note that as I have had no predecessor on this subject, and have been obliged to gather materials from many scattered sources, it is very probable that some evidence of importance has escaped me. This is not likely to be the case in those portions of the book where I have had the advantage of using Droysen's History of Hellenism, or Hertzberg's History of Greece under the Romans. But the former of these books stops with the battle of Sellasia and the death of Antigonus Doson, while the latter confines itself to the direct relations of Rome with Greece, and therefore begins later in the epoch chosen, nor does it even then touch on Asiatic or Egyptian Hellenism. The Jewish reaction had to be sought in a wholly different field of literature—Josephus, Aristéas, Clemens Alexandrinus, and the theological historians who have in recent time studied the Apocrypha. Polybius, of course, is our main source for the latter chapters, and the reader will find him largely quoted from Hultsch's edition. I have in conclusion to express my obligations to Professor Atkinson and Mr. George Macmillan for many corrections, and to Mr. E. S. Shuckburgh for allowing me to use passages from his yet unpublished translation of Polybius.

¹ It must be remembered that many of the dates in this period are disputed, and many not to be accurately determined. Fortunately, approximate dates are sufficient for a study of social life.

TRINITY COLLEGE, DUBLIN,
10th October 1887.

CONTENTS

	PAGE
CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE	xiii
INTRODUCTION	xxxi
CHAP.
I. THE IMMEDIATE EFFECT OF ALEXANDER'S CONQUESTS ON SOCIAL LIFE IN GREECE	1
II. THE REVOLUTION IN HELLENIC LIFE MADE BY ALEXANDER'S IDEAS	17
III. THE DIADOCHI AS EXECUTORS OF ALEXANDER'S IDEAS	32
IV. THE YOUNGER GENERATION OF DIADOCHI, AND THE PRINCESSES OF THEIR DAY	49
V. HOME POLITICS DURING THE WARS OF THE DIADOCHI	71
VI. THE RELATION OF ART AND LITERATURE TO THE SOCIAL LIFE OF THE PERIOD	101
VII. THE SERIOUS SIDE OF GREEK SOCIETY—THE RE- LIGION OF THE DAY	130
VIII. THE GOLDEN AGE OF THE HELLENISTIC WORLD .	151
IX. ALEXANDRIA AND ITS RIVALS	160
X. THE ALEXANDRIA OF PHILADELPHUS, ANTIOCH, ETC.	199
XI. THE LITERATURE OF ALEXANDRIA UNDER THE FIRST AND SECOND PTOLEMIES	222
XII. ALEXANDRIAN LITERATURE— continued	264

CHAP.	P.
XIII. THE CITY LIFE OF THE THIRD CENTURY B.C., AND ITS EFFECTS UPON THE CIVILISATION OF THE AGE	:
XIV. PERGAMUM AND ITS POSITION IN THE HELLENISTIC WORLD	:
XV. THE MERCANTILE ASPECTS OF HELLENISM, LEAGUES AND FEDERATIONS, ARBITRATION, PUBLIC CREDIT	:
XVI. THE GREECE OF ARATUS	:
XVII. THE INNER LIFE OF THE PERIOD	:
XVIII. THE CRISIS OF HELLENISM	:
XIX. THE GRADUAL SUBJECTION OF HELLENISM TO ROME —THE CRISIS IN GREECE AND THE SETTLEMENT OF ASIA MINOR	:
XX. DECAYING HELLENISM IN SYRIA—ITS COLLISION WITH JUDAISM	:
XXI. DECAYING HELLENISM IN EGYPT	:
XXII. POLYBIUS AND HIS AGE	:
XXIII. THE IMPORTATION OF HELLENISM TO ROME	:
APPENDIX	:
INDEX	:

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE

THE FORTY-FIVE YEARS' WAR.

DEATH OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT

1ST SETTLEMENT—PERDIKKAS, SELEUCUS, CRATERUS, AND CASANDER TAKE THE HIGHEST OFFICES IN THE REGENCY FOR ALEXANDER'S HEIR, WHILE IN—

	MACEDONIA AND GREECE.	SYRIA.	EGYPT.	PHRYGIA, ASIA MINOR N., AND ASIA MINOR S.	THE HELLESPOINT AND THRACE.
a.c. 323	Antipater. The far Eastern Provinces are not here considered, because they lie beyond the bounds of Hellenism proper.	Laomedon.	Ptolemy.	Antigonus. Eumenes. Asander.	Leonnatus. Lysimachus.
322	Revolt in Greece. Lamian War, battle of Crannon. Leonnatus killed. Antipater's settlement of Athens. Death of Demosthenes. War against Ætolians.	...	Ptolemy secures the body of Alexander, and resists Perdikkas.	Conquest of Cappadocia by Perdikkas and Eumenes. Flight of Antigonus to Antipater.	[Epicurus comes to Athens. Death of Diogenes the Cynic.]
321	Death of Perdikkas in Egypt	Death of Craterus in Cappadocia, fighting against Eumenes.
Death of Aristotle. Theophrastus succeeds him as head of the Peripatetic School.
2ND SETTLEMENT AT TRIPARADEISUS IN SYRIA.
...	Antipater confirmed	Laomedon confirmed.	Ptolemy confirmed in all African possessions.	Antigonus confirmed and made Commander of the Forces for the Regency. Most of the other satrapies changed, but into obscure hands. Eumenes outlawed	Lysimachus confirmed.

318	and in consequence new struggle for the office of Regent and the central authority—who makes Polysperchon Regent. Casander flies to Asia. Polysperchon declares all the Greeks free. Death of Phocion. Polysperchon at war in Peloponnesus. Casander recovers power over Athens, and settles it under his command. Demetrius Phalereus	...		with Antigonus. Antigonus repudiates Polysperchon.
317	Death of Arridæus and Eurydice at the hands of Olympias. Agathocles tyrant of Syracuse. Census at Athens. Casander master of Macedon. Olympias's death. Decree of Sophocles against the Philosophers.	...		Naval victories of Antigonus at the Hellespont.
316		Antigonus lord of Syria.	Ptolemy settled but threatened by Antiochus in Palestine by Antigonus.	Eumenes flies to Eastern Provinces, and carries on the war against Antigonus.
				Lysimachus established in Thrace and in Mysia, holding the Hellespont.
		Coalition of all the other satraps against the dominant power of Antigonus.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE

	MACEDONIA AND GREECE.	SYRIA AND BABYLON.	EGYPT.	ASIA MINOR AND THE ISLANDS.	THE HELLESPONT AND THRACE.
315 B.C.	Roxane and her son in Casander's power Antigonus's proclamation against him, and of liberty to all the Greeks. War of Antigonus and Casander's generals in Greece. Rebuilding of Thebes by Casander. Successes of Casander against Polysperchon and the generals of Antigonus.	Antigonus conquers Phoenicia and Palestine on his way to attack Egypt.	..	War of Antigonus against the coalition in Asia Minor. Defeat and renewed revolt of Asander.
314
313		Continuation of desultory operations in various directions all through the provinces.
312		Demetrius attacks Ptolemy in Palestine, and is defeated at Gaza

310	under his guardian. Murder of Alexander III. and Roxane by Casander. [Agathocles in Africa.]	...	Ptolemy's proclamation to enforce the liberty of the Greek cities.	...	Foundation of Lysimacheia (near Cardia) by Lysimachus.
309	Murder of the bastard Herakles (the last heir of Alexander). The Spartan Cleonymus goes to serve in Magna Græcia.	...	Ptolemy threatened by Agathocles from the West.
308	..	Foundation of Antigoneia on the Orontes.	...	Foundation of Antigoneia in the Troad by Antigonus.	...
307	Demetrius, son of Antigonus, comes to Athens, and expels Demetrius Phalereus and Casander's forces.	Demetrius carries on naval wars at Cyprus, and defeats Ptolemy at Salamis.	...
306	The Athenians first revive for him the title of king. All the satraps assume the title of kings. The idea of regency abandoned.	Antigonus's expedition against Egypt and its defeat.	...	Siege of Rhodes by Demetrius.	...
305	Decree of Sophocles at Athens against the philosophers. Struggle of Demetrius Pol. and Casander for Greece.
303	Refoundation of Sicyon as Demetrius.

ANTIGONUS AND LYSIMACHUS		SYRIA AND MACEDONIA		ASIA
302 B.C.	Demetrius again at Athens.		2d coalition of the other satraps against Antigonus.
	Demetrius and Casander still at war in Greece.
			Conquest of Palestine and Coele-Syria by Ptolemy.		Campaign of Antigonus against Lysimachus.
301	Demetrius and Casander adjourn the war to Asia.		...		Great battle of Ipsus, death of Antigonus, and Demetrius a fugitive with only naval forces.
		New division of the provinces of Antigonus, omitting Ptolemy, who had not fought at Ipsus. Casander holds Macedonia and Greece, Lysimachus obtains all Asia Minor, with control of the Greek cities on the coast. Seleucus holds all the East and Syria. Matrimonial alliances between Demetrius and Seleucus on the one hand, Ptolemy and Lysimachus on the other, showing the jealousies arising from the division of the provinces after Ipsus.
300	Agathocles of Sicily conquers Corcyra.			Pyrrhus of Epirus sent a hostage for Demetrius to Egypt.
	The Athenians prepare for war against Demetrius, and combine with Casander.		...		Zipoetes assumes the title of king in Bithynia.

			Carmania destroyed		Lysimachus at war with the Getæ.

296	Lachares tyrant of Athens. Death of Casander. Antipater and Alexander, brothers of Philip IV., struggle for his crown.	..	Demetrius Phalereus goes to Egypt.	...	The young Antipater of Macedon flies to Lysimachus.
295	Demetrius Pol. expels Lachares, and again enters Athens in triumph. War of Demetrius in Greece.	...	Ptolemy restores Pyrrhus to Epirus.	...	Lysimachus enticed into the steppes and captured by the Getæ.
294	Pyrrhus king of Epirus. Demetrius assassinales the young Alexander IV. of Macedon. Demetrius Poliorcetes King of Macedon. He puts a garrison in Athens and Thebes.	Lysimachus liberated.
293	Peace with Lysimachus, who cedes Antipater's rights to Demetrius.
291	Revolt of Thebes from Demetrius. Death of Menander.
290	Alliance of Agathocles of Syracuse with Demetrius.
289	War of Demetrius against Pyrrhus and the Ætolians.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE

	MACEDONIA AND GREECE	SYRIA AND BABYLON.	EGYPT.	ASIA MINOR AND THE ISLANDS.	THE HELLESPONT AND THRACE.
B.C.
288	[Death of Agathocles, tyrant.] Demetrius makes peace with Pyrrhus, and begins great preparations for a new conquest of the East.	Coalition of the three powers against Demetrius, who invite Pyrrhus to join. Demetrius's soldiers desert him both against Lysimachus and Pyrrhus. ...
287	Demetrius flies from his kingdom, and Phila commits suicide. Olympiodorus proclaims freedom at Athens, but Piræus is held by Antigonus.		..	Demetrius passes into Asia Minor, which he raises against Lysimachus, whose son, Agathocles, drives him into Cilicia.	Lysimachus divides Macedonia with Pyrrhus.
286	Lysimachus defeats and expels Pyrrhus from Macedonia.	Demetrius appeals to Seleucus. Last struggles and capture of Demetrius by Seleucus.	Lysimachus now master of Macedonia, Thrace, and most of Asia Minor.
285	Ptolemy I. surrenders the kingdom to his second son, Ptolemy Philadelphus.	..	Hetæus Heracleia in Pontus. Ptolemy Keraunus goes to Lysimachus's court.

283	...	Ptolemy Keraunus flies to Seleucus.	Death of Ptolemy I.
282	...	Seleucus declares war.	...	Seleucus conquers most of Asia Minor.
281	Seleucus is now master of almost all the empire of Alexander, and proceeds to Macedonia. Murder of Seleucus by Ptolemy Keraunus, who assumes the crown of Macedon. Pyrrhus goes to Italy.	Battle of Korupedion, in which Lysimachus is killed.
280	Rise of the Achaean League. [Battle of Heracleia in Italy.] Invasion of the Galatæ or Celts, who devastate all Macedonia and Thrace. Keraunus killed in battle. Anarchy. Apollodorus, tyrant of Casandria Defeat of Brennus at Delphi. [Pyrrhus goes to Sicily.] Antigonus orders Macedonia as king.	Antiochus I. (Soter) succeeds to the throne. ...	Ptolemy II. seizes Syria as far as Damascus.	Phileteerus holds Pergamum.
279				The children of Lysimachus murdered by Ptolemy Keraunus at Casandria.
278		Antigonus defeats the Galatæ at Lysimachia.
277		War with Macedon.	...	Kingdom of Tylis in Thrace formed.

The new era of the Hellenistic kingdoms commences here.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE

SYRIA AND BABYLON.	GYPT.	ASIA MINOR AND THE ISLANDS.
...
...
...	Embassy of Ptolemy Philadelphus to Rome.
...
...
...

258	Death of Magas of Cyrene.
255	Demetrius the Fair at Cyrene.
252	Birth of Philopœmen.
251	Aratus frees Sicyon.
250	...	Revolt of Diodotus in Bactria.	Death of Demetrius the Fair in Cyrene.	Ziælas's accession.	Expedition of Regulus.
249	...	Rise of Arsaces and the Parthian kingdom.
247	...	Murder of Queen Berenice by Laodice.	Ptolemy III.'s accession.	...	Defeated and taken by Xanthippus Hamilcar Barca, Carthaginian general. Birth of Hannibal.
246	...	Seleucus II.'s (Callinicus) accession.	His expedition to Asia.	Rhodes and the Greek cities at war with Egypt.
245	Defeat of Antigonus by the Egyptians at Andros.	Letter of Seleucus to the Senate at Rome.	Appoints Xanthippus to satrapy of Mesopotamia.	...	The Senate answer Seleucus in Greek, demanding freedom for Ilion.
244	Aratus Commander of the League.
243	Agis IV., King of Sparta.
242	Aratus liberates Corinth.
241	Death of Agis IV.	Accession of Attalus I.	Victory of Catulus, and close of the war. Livius begins to exhibit plays.
240	Attalus's victory over the Galatæ.	Birth of Ennius.
239	Death of Antigonus Gonatas.	Peace with Egypt.		Mithridates IV., King of Pontus.	Intervention of Romans for Acarnania with the Ætolians.
238	Demetrius II. succeeds.			...	Hamilcar goes to Spain.
	...	War of Seleucus II. in the East.	The decree of Canopus.	...

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE

	MACEDONIA AND GREECE.	SYRIA AND BABYLON.	EGYPT.	ASIA MINOR AND THE ISLANDS.	ROME.
237 B.C.		War of Seleucus with his brother Antiochus Hierax.		Antiochus Hierax in Asia Minor.
235 233	... Lydiades surrenders his tyranny, and Megalopolis joins the League. Illyrian raids.	Temple of Janus shut. Naevius exhibits plays.
232 231	Apollodorus Carystius, the comic poet, flourishing at Athens.	..	Machon, the comic poet, flourishing at Alexandria.
230	Illyrian raids.	War with Queen Teuta of Illyria.
229 II.	Death of Demetrius.	Death of Hamilcar, Hasdrubal succeeds.
	Accession of Antigonus Doson.				First diplomatic relations with Greece (Acamania).
228	Various Greek tyrants resign. Teuta subdues the Consul. Postumius winters in Illyria.	Prusias's accession.
227	The Romans admitted to Hellenic games and feasts.
	Cleomenes III., King of Sparta.
226	Death of Lydiades. Cleomenes's coup d'état.	Seleucus III. killed, Seleucus IV. (Kerannus) succeeds.	..	Earthquake at Rhodes.

225	Cleomenic war preparing.	Gaulic war.
223	Aratus's treaty with Antigonus Doson.	Achæus satrap of Asia Minor (for Seleucus).
222	...	Antiochus III.'s accession.	...
221	Battle of Sellasia. Death of Antigonus Doson.	...	Ptolemy III. died, and Ptolemy IV.'s accession.		Hannibal succeeds Hasdrubal in Spain.
220	Philip V.'s accession. Social war in Greece.	War in Coele-Syria.	...	Attalus besieged by Achæus. War of Rhodes with Byzantium. Antiarthes IV.'s accession.
219	Attalus at war with the Greek cities of Æolis.	Demetrius of Pharos conquered by Rome. Outbreak of second Punic war.
218	Philip sacks Thermus.	War with Egypt.	War with Syria.		Battle of Trebia. Battle of Thrasimene.
217	Peace made in Greece and Macedonia.	Battle of Raphia.	...		Battle of Cannæ.
216	Treaty of Antiochus the Great and Attalus.
215	Treaty of Philip and Hannibal.	Achæus captured at Sardis.
214	Philip in Illyria.
213	Death of Aratus.		Capture of Tarentum by Hannibal. Fall of Syracuse. Fall of Capua.
212
211	Laevinus at the Ætolian Parliament.		First Macedonian War.
210	War of Romans and Ætolians against Philip. Machanidas, tyrant of Sparta.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE

xxvi.

	MACEDONIA AND GREECE.	SYRIA AND BABYLON.	EGYPT.	ASIA MINOR AND THE ISLANDS.	ROME.
B.C. 209	Philopœmen hipparch of the Achæan League.	Marcellus the consul slain.
208	Defeat of Hasdrubal at the Metaurus.
207	Philopœmen Commander of the League.	Scipio's visit to Syphax in Africa.
206	Death of Chrysippus the Stoic.	End of Macedonian war. Treaty with Philip.
205	Machanidas slain.	Battle of Zama. Peace with Carthage.
204	Peace of Ætolians with Philip.	Second Macedonian war.
203	Nabis tyrant of Sparta.	Treaty with Philip.	Death of Ptolemy IV. Ptolemy V.'s (Epi- phanes) acces- sion.	Rhodians and Attalus support Egypt against Philip.
202
201	Treaty of Philip with Antiochus III. to plunder Egypt.
200	Quarrel of Philip with Athens.
199	Philopœmen again Commander.
	Capture of Abydos by Philip.
	War with Rome.
	Philopœmen leaves for Crete.

198	Antiochus defeats Scopas at Panion, and conquers Cœle-Syria.	...	Flamininus consul.
197	Defeat of Philip at Cynoscephalæ, and peace.	Death of Atalus I. Eumenes II. succeeds at Pergamum.
196	Declaration of freedom at the Isthmian games.	...	Scopas put to death.	..	Wars against Insubres and Boii.
195	Campaign against Nabis.	Hannibal arrives at Ephesus.	Erasthenes dies, and is succeeded in the Alexandrian Library by Apollonius Rhodius.	..	Public games (Megalesia) first celebrated at Rome, with reserved seats for senators.
194	The three fortresses evacuated. Flamininus's departure.	Antiochus makes conquests in Thrace.	Ptolemy marries the Syrian Cleopatra
193	...	Roman ultimatum.	...	Ariarathes IV. marries Antiochis, daughter of Antiochus III.
192	Philopomen Con- mander. Antiochus invited to Greece by the Ætolians.	Expedition of Antiochus to Greece.	...	Naval operations of Rhodes, etc., against Antiochus and Hannibal.	Glabrio and Cato commanding against Antiochus in Greece.
191	...	He winters in Chalcis. Defeated at Thermopylæ. Battle of Magnesia. Peace with Rome.	...	Pharnaces King of Pontus. Rhodes and Pergamum rewarded by Rome. Campaign of C. Manlius Vulso through Asia Minor	Antiochus (Epiphanes) hostage at Rome.
190 189	Ætolians subdued by Rome. The Achaean League reaches its greatest extension.	Ligurian wars in process.
188	Discontent at Sparta, and Philopomen's conquest of it.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE

	MACEDONIA AND GREECE.	SYRIA AND BABYLON.	EGYPT.	ASIA MINOR AND THE ISLANDS.	ROME.
B.C. 187	...	Antiochus III. dies. Seleucus Philo- pator's accession.	Alliance with Achæans.		Flaminian way begun.
186	Interference of Romans with the Achæan League.	Senatus consultum de Bac- chanalibus.
185	Complaints against Philip brought to Rome.
184	Philip humiliated by Rome. Death of Philopoemen.	Complaints of Sparta against the Achæan League. Discussions of Achæans, Spartans, etc., before the Senate.
183	Conquest of Messene by the League. Peace with Sparta.	..	Death of Apollonius Rhodius. Aristony- mus succeeds to the Library.	Sinope conquered by Pharnaces.	Death of Plautus. The Senate declares for non- interference. Mission of T. Flamininus to Greece and the East.
182	Death of Hannibal. War among the Asiatic dynasts. Prusias II.'s accession.
181	Apparent peace and contentment in Pello- ponnesus.	..	Ptolemy V. dies. Ptolemy VI.'s (Phi- lometor) accession.	Mission of Eumenes to Rome. Missions of Ariarathes and Phar- naces to Rome.
180	Rome insists on the restoration of the Spar- tan exiles.	Mission of Callicrates, Ara- tus, and Lydiades (the younger).
179	Callicrates Commander Death of Philip V. Perseus's accession.	Peace and treaty between Eu- menes, Prusias, and Ariarathes, as against Pharnaces and Mithridates.	Istrian wars.

177	Gradual interference with Rhodes. End of the Ligurian wars.
175	Eumenes's statues razed.	...	Seleucus Philopator dies. Antiochus IV.'s (Eiphanes) accession. He sends splendid gifts to Greece.
174	Perseus's demonstration at Delphi, and mission to Carthage.	Artaxias of Armenia conquered by Antiochus IV.
173	Eumenes goes to complain at Rome.	Roman missions to northern Greece. Roman troops sent to Apollonia. Third Macedonia war.
172	Diplomatic preparation for Macedonian war. Intrigues of Charops in Epirus.
171	Successes of Perseus.	Antiochus invades Egypt. War with Syria.	...	Defeat of Licinius Crassus by Perseus.
170	Fruitless campaign of Mancinus.	Second expedition to Memphis.	...	do.	...	Death of Ennius.
169	Quintus Marcius crosses Mount Olympus without result.	Third campaign in Egypt.	...	Joint reign of the two Ptolemies.	...
168	Battle of Pydna (June 22).	Fourth campaign. Antiochus plunders and profanes the temple of Jerusalem.	...	The war stopped by the circle of Poppilius Lænas, and Alexandria saved by Roman interference.	...	M. Æ. Paullus, consul.
167	Macedonia divided into separate republics. Epirus depopulated.	Eumenes humiliated by Rome. Rhodes commercially ruined.	Triumph of Paullus. Dramatic show of Anicius the prætor. Polybius at Rome.
166	Mission from Athens to Rome.	The Achæans deported to Italy.	Andria of Terence performed.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE

	MACEDONIA AND GREECE	SYRIA AND BABYLON.	EGYPT.	ASIA MINOR AND THE ISLANDS.	ROME.
165 B.C.	...	Antiochus IV. in Upper Asia.	..	Rhodian citizens executed and extradited for anti-Roman policy.
164	.	Antiochus V. (Eupator) succeeds Euphanes.	...	Treaty and peace with Rome.	The Achæans appeal at Rome.
163	Ptolemy Physcon settled at Cyrene.	Ariarathes V.'s accession.	Commission sent to Macedonia to restore order.
162	.	Demetrius Soter escapes from Rome, succeeds Eupator.	Both the Ptolemies go to Rome to appeal		Terence's Heautontimorumenos .
161	.	Murder of the Roman envoy at Syrian Laodicea.	...		Terence's Eunuchus and Phormio .
160 159	Attalus II. succeeds Eumenes.	Edict against philosophers and rhetors at Rome.
158	Ariarathes expelled by Demetrius Soter from Cappadocia, in favour of Orophernes.	Renewed appeal of Achæans.
157	Death of Charops.	.	.	Ariarathes appeals at Rome against Orophernes, and is restored with the help of Attalus II.	Death of Terence's Adelphi . Crates at Rome. Death of Terence.

156	Raid of Athens upon Oropus.	...	Aristarchus now famous.	Mithridates Euergetes's accession in Pontus. War of Attalus with Prusias.	Dalmatian war. Mission to coerce Prusias and protect Attalus. Carnades, Diogenes, and Critolaus sent on an embassy by Athens to Rome. Pacuvius and Attius now producing tragedies.
155	The Achæans again appeal for the liberation of the hostages.
154	Ptolemy Physcon again at Rome to appeal against his brother.	...
153	The Rhodians appeal for help to the League, and are refused. The exiles return from Italy.	War between Rhodes and Crete.	Celtiberian war begins.
150		Alexander accession.	The Egyptian Cleopatra married to Bala.
149	Darius Commander of the League. War of Achæans with Sparta. Insurrection of the pretender Philip in Macedonia.		...	Nicomedes Epiphanes's accession in Bithynia.	Death of Cato. Spartans appeal to Rome against the Achæan League. Quintus Metellus sent against the Macedonian pretender.
148	...				Rupture with Carthage (third Punic war). Scipio Æmilianus and Polybius go to Africa. Birth of Lucilius. Mission of L. Aur. Orestes to Greece. Mission of S. Julius Cæsar to Greece, and new policy.
147	Darius again Commander. A new pretender in Macedonia.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE

	MACEDONIA AND GREECE.	SYRIA AND BABYLON.	EGYPT.	ASIA MINOR AND THE ISLANDS.	ROME.
B.C. 146	Critolaus Commander. Meeting of the League at Corinth. War de- clared. Metellus conquers at Scarpheia in Locria. Mummius arrives, de- feats the Achæans and destroys Corinth.	Demetrius Nica- tor's accession.	Death of Ptolemy VI. (in Syria). Ptolemy VII. (Phys- con) succeeds.		Macedonia to be made a province. Destruction of Carthage. Viriathus in Spain.

Rome paramount in the Hellenistic world.

INTRODUCTION

ANY one who comes to study the Hellenic Renaissance in England, which has assumed such force and such extension in our own day, cannot but be surprised at the abrupt way in which all its studies stop about halfway on in Greek History. By a sort of tacit consent the battle of Chæroneia is considered the minor limit of all that was good and perfect in Greek thought and life. The conquests of Alexander, the high culture of Seleucia and Alexandria, the profound thinking of the later schools, the deep learning, the splendid art, the multiform politics of Hellenism—all this is shut out from the schoolboy, as forming no part of the Greek he is to know, and none of it is ever again taken up—with the exception of Theocritus—by the superannuated schoolboy who holds fellowships and masterships at English Colleges, and regards himself as a perfectly trained Greek scholar. A man may consider himself, and be considered by the classical English public, an adequate and even distinguished Greek Professor, who has never read or even possessed a copy of Strabo, Diodorus, or Polybius, who has never seen the poems of Aratus, Callimachus, or Apollonius, and who does not know a single date in Greek history between the death of Alexander and the battle of Cynoscephalæ. From that time onward the accident that Greece enters into the field of Roman history lifts the veil, and the student comes upon a Hellenistic world, so different from the old Hellenic republics, that but for the permanence of names and places the people might be difficult to recognise. But after the conquest of Greece by Mummius, Greece as a living moment in the world's history is forgotten. Philippi, Pharsalia, and Actium might as well have been fought in Asia or in Spain, and the literary activity of the Greeks under the empire is rather avoided than neglected by modern Hellenists. For there is a notion abroad among the 'pure scholars,' as they are pleased to call themselves, that the study of any but the golden age of Greek literature is a contamination of their spotless Atticism. The occurrence of later forms, or of constructions unused by Aristophanes, is so foul a stain, that not the infinite richness of story in Polybius, or the splendid morals in Plutarch, or the large information in Strabo, or the wit in Lucian, or the unconscious sublimity in the Gospels, can save them from being rejected as 'bad Greek,' and excluded from school and college studies.

This is no doubt the first and most efficient cause of our general ignorance of what is called Hellenism, as opposed to Hellenedom. The golden age—in literary style, though by no means in philosophy or in art—ended with Demosthenes, and this question of style has overridden larger and higher considerations. No better Greek study than Plutarch's Lives could possibly be appointed for boys—with one exception, that of style ; and so the intricacies of Demosthenes, the subtleties of Plato, or the contortions of Thucydides are given them to read in preference. Great results are indeed required to justify this strict exclusiveness.

A curious accident has, however, aided the 'pure scholars,' and made their triumph in our generation almost complete. Our greatest Greek historian, Grote, was not at all one of their number. His perception of the exact meaning of tenses or particles was such as to excite the rage and contempt of their now forgotten coryphæus. But Grote was a radical and a democrat, and composed his great political pamphlet in twelve volumes to show the splendours of republican government. Hence he could only traduce Alexander the Great, and turn with indignant disgust from the later politics of the petty states of Greece. He had no heart to comprehend the splendour of intelligent monarchy, or the wisdom of federations. But his great book dominated our studies, and the smaller handbooks have abridged Grote and not Thirlwall, and wind up the history of Greece with the close, not of its philosophical and artistic, but of its political and literary supremacy, overlooking the fact that the apparent political death of Greece meant only its absorption into larger systems, and its entry into the wider stream of the world's history.

It is not my object to dispute for one moment the selection thus made on the ground of literary excellence. And if a boundary line is to be drawn anywhere, there can be no doubt that it is rightly drawn at the accession of Alexander. His mighty conquests, the unlocking of the treasures of the East, and the generation of wars under the first Diadochi, established so great a gulf between earlier Hellenedom and later Hellenism, that when settled life was again resumed in Greece all feeling of contact with the Demosthenic age was gone, and Alexander was regarded as the first point of modern history. No historical claim anterior to the division of his empire is urged as serious ; no literary work is cited earlier than the historians of his day. Thus Polybius, who cites at every turn Ephorus, Theopompus, and Timæus, refers but once to Xenophon, once to Thucydides, twice to Herodotus.¹

There are other such periods in history, when half a century makes more change than ages that went before or that follow after. It is established beyond contradiction that the literary and artistic excellence of Greece before Alexander was never again attained by any nation or any age. But while this may be good reason for our decided preference, it is not so for the complete neglect of what the Greeks afterwards achieved. Mr. Freeman has shown, in his masterly history of the later Greek Federations, how one of the most fruitful ideas of modern politics was then first adopted. The Apollo Belvedere, the Laocoon, the Dying Gaul, and the Venus of Melos fortunately inspired modern artists and critics before they were discovered to belong to the so-called days of Greek decadence. But these and the recent discoveries at Pergamum show that the silver days of Greek art were more splendid than the gold of other nations. Above all it should be insisted that the greatest practical inheritance the Greeks left in philosophy was not the splendour of Plato, or the vast erudition of Aristotle, but the practical systems of Zeno and Epicurus, and the scepticism of Pyrrho. In the Roman Empire Platonists and Aristotelians were scarce ; Stoics and Epicureans occupied all society. And if in the Middle Ages the schoolmen returned to the great classical masters, in our own day the world has again fallen into modern paths, and every man is either a Stoic, an Epicurean, or a Sceptic. These eternal systems were born not in the golden but in the silver age of Greek literature.

¹ There is no reason to think that if we possessed the whole of his history, the proportion would be altered.

Here surely are ample claims for our consideration.

CHAPTER I

THE IMMEDIATE EFFECT OF ALEXANDER'S CONQUESTS ON SOCIAL LIFE IN GREECE

It is truly wonderful how the literary study of Greek eloquence has blinded modern Hellenists to the condition of the Greeks after the accession of Alexander. Ask any classical scholar what were the prominent events of the year 330 B.C., and the chances are a thousand to one he will tell you of the great trial of policy and eloquence between Æschines and Demosthenes. If he be very learned in Greek literature, he will be proud to add that this was the year of the prosecution of Leocrates by Lycurgus, as can be inferred from this orator's sole extant oration. Yet all these magnificent harangues were occupied in impeaching or defending the conduct and policy of eight years before, or even earlier. They discuss what ought, or what ought not, to have been done before or after Chæroneia, and what might, or might not, have happened, had the other side won, or had something happened which did not happen.

But the oratorical splendours of the contest, and even the moral splendours exhibited by the once patriotic side, could not have blinded any intelligent man of the rising generation to the fact that all this pother about a bygone policy was but magnificent fooling. What matter whether a golden crown was voted to Demosthenes rightly or not? what matter whether a broken-down politician had been honest or not? The world had moved on a century in these eight years. Every political problem then of interest had gone into the lumber-room of antiquarian curiosities. The news was abroad that Darius was dead, and Alexander not only conqueror but heir to the orphan empire of the great king. Nay, he had even reached beyond the very bounds of fable—the Amazons, the Pigmies, and the mountains of gold. Eye-witnesses were coming home who had seen the sack of Susa and of Persepolis, where gold and jewels were found enough to buy the whole of Greece ten times over. How senseless to stand out against these facts!

The sudden death of Alexander might, indeed, bring his empire into confusion, and so give occasion for a revolt and an assertion of liberty in the petty cantons and decaying towns of Greece. But the smallest fraction of this Eastern wealth, controlled by Macedonian vigour and military skill, must be more than a match for even Spartan valour. It was indeed true that all the spoil now fell not to Greeks but to Macedonians, whom Demosthenes asserted he would not buy for decent slaves. But they had now proved themselves complete masters not merely of Demosthenes but of all the world. The time was come to forget that they were once thought barbarian outsiders to Hellenic culture, and to furbish up the despised genealogies by which their kings sought to prove their descent from Æacus. The Macedonians too on their part, at least the better among them, were anxious to make up the quarrel and pose as Greeks in language and culture. It was harder to persuade the ruder soldiery, who felt the difference most thoroughly, and no doubt retorted Demosthenes's indecent sneer in his very words and with far better reason. But in spite of this jealousy towards those who came in at the eleventh hour of the day, there was endless wealth of plunder, endless scope for lucrative employment in the East; an immense civil service was required, with endless possibilities of new trade and commerce, even if the demand for highly paid mercenaries should ever fail.

An amalgamation therefore of Greek and Macedonian interests was the policy which every true and reasonable patriot should have adopted. There was sure to be an immense emigration of young and adventurous men to seek their fortunes in the East. Were they to go as exiles, deserting their country to serve an enemy, or as citizens of a great Græco-Macedonian kingdom, all of whose subjects had its glory at heart, and regarded its profits their legitimate reward? There could be only one reasonable answer, and that was the answer not given by the leading states of Greece. Thebes was destroyed. The natural leaders of opinion were Athens and Sparta. The Athenians, when they dared not revolt, sulked and sneered. The Spartans stood aloof in sullen disgust, and then took up arms against Antipater, Alexander's Lord Lieutenant for Greece. Well might Alexander exclaim when he heard of their defeat: 'Macedonians, while we were conquering Darius out here there seems to have been some battle of mice in Arcadia!' ¹

Such parochial politics might fairly be expected from Sparta where five ignorant old men were appointed to watch the close adherence of the state to the system of a fabulous legislator whose great title to fame was his success in bygone centuries. But it is not adequately felt how terribly leading patriots, nay, all the leading politicians of their prime. There was not a single young man taking part in public affairs; Leosthenes was an exception. Even Phocion, who had sensible views, was too old to see beyond the boundaries of Greece. A young orator ventured to preach the coming of the Macedonian masters, who had the ear of the assembly, and he was treated as a hireling and a traitor. The alternative was to give up politics altogether, and retire from the agora into private life, or to abandon the country and make a home in the East at the risk of being branded a traitor. Though a vast number went, many remained at home by want of energy, by family ties, by that fatal inertia which dominates the majority in all ages. These must be content to live as farmers, as merchants, or upon the fixed income produced by their property. The sudden growth and importance of the philosophic schools in this and the next generation was a great loss to the thoughtful and original men who stayed at home. The fight in scientific ethics occupied them for the loss of which they found no consolation for the misconstruction put upon their views by the noisy patriots.

¹ Plut. Agésilais, 15, εἰκεν, ὧ ἄνδρες, ὅτε ἡμεῖς Δαρεῖον ἐνικῶμεν ὧδε, ἐκεῖ τις ἐν Ἀρκαδίᾳ γεγονέναι μυομαχίαν.

All these remaining

once been small. So the rapid depreciation of money, owing to the liberated millions of Persian treasure—the collection of ages—caused an equally rapid increase of prices, while only the returned emigrants or Macedonian officials had acquired an increase of wealth. These economic phenomena become clearer in the succeeding generation, and will occupy us in due time.

But the beginning of everything which we have to record about the Hellenistic age is already laid. The battle of Issus may be regarded as the perfectly decisive event when Hellenedom was buried and Hellenism weaned. The anxious patriots of Athens, hoping not without hope, eagerly watched events as the news came that Alexander was caught in the mountains and defiles of Cilicia, that his communications with Greece were cut off, and Darius with an immense army was in his rear. But they required no reasonable hopes to feed them. They had lived forty years in a political party, and we could hardly expect any political conversion after such training.

We must therefore judge the party of Demosthenes kindly, as we judge all the other old men who have done mischief in the world. We may attribute to them the highest motives, we may long that they had been successful in their youth. But all this respect cannot save us from the reflection that it would have been better for Greece if Philip after Chæronea, or even Alexander after the ruin of Thebes, had insisted upon the execution of ‘the orators,’ and pacified Greece not only in outward act but in inward spirit. For it is hard to overestimate the influence of such orators as Demosthenes or Hypercides, working upon old prejudices, ingrained vanity, and provincial pride. All the lesser states in Greece seem to follow in the wake of Athens and Sparta, and favour an anti-Macedonian spirit publicly ;

while thousands of their citizens were growing rich and great in the service of the Empire.

But we are quite accustomed in our own day to this Home Rule and Separatist spirit, while the very complainants are profiting signally by the greatness and the resources of the empire which they revile and profess to hate. These modern instances also show us how this policy may be kept up and grow even where every effort is being made to remove all complaint, and where no one can see that the liberty loudly demanded differs sensibly from the liberties already conceded by the sovereign state. If we had no living examples of this feeling before us, we should certainly have said that the ineffaceable passion for autonomy, which marks every epoch of Greek history, and every canton within its limits, must have arisen from the excesses committed by the officers of foreign potentates, or local tyrants. The tyrant of old, Herodotus had said, upsets the laws of cities, violates women and boys, and slays men without trial. Such also were but too many of the later tyrants. But the outrageous prints circulated in Ireland in our own day show that a ruler may be the soberest, the most conscientious, the most considerate, and yet have terrible things said of him by mere political malcontents. In fact the tirades against the person of the ruler show that there is not adequate fault to be found with the system he represents; so then it is possible that in some Greek states the malcontents against Macedonian supremacy may have been, beyond political irreconcilables, men who had no grievance except poverty and a desire to modify the laws to their advantage, which the vice-regent of the empire forbade. For, as I have said, the rich, by becoming rich suddenly and from without, had made the poor poorer, and no doubt squandered their own fortunes with ostentation and insolence. They seem to have bought up land too, probably from people who saw their good fortune and hoped to imitate it ; for we see in the following generations the Land Question coming forward and forming one branch of the socialistic movements of the third century B.C.

But how completely wealth, and with wealth political power, passed into new hands, appears most clearly from a phenomenon well known and yet not explained—the rise of the Achæan and Ætolian Leagues. The federative principle was the old and natural bond of union among small cantons which had no natural Capital city. But why had they no Capital ? and why did they come into such prominence in the third century, after ages of obscurity ? The decay of other states is no real cause ; for it is not in comparison with Athens and Thebes, but actually and in relation to foreign powers, that we see their remarkable increase. A thousand states have relapsed into obscurity without producing any change to greatness in neighbours normally and traditionally obscure.

The cause must lie in the sudden increase of wealth among the Achæans and Ætolians, while the rest of Greece was gradually growing poorer. And this sudden increase is easily explained. The two wildest and most rugged systems of alps in Greece are the region from Mount Parnassus westward, where we find no valley or arable land all the way to the coast of Acarnania, and the mountains of Achaia and Northern Arcadia—districts of which the bounds are completely untraceable in the great complex of mountains which reach from Mount Erymanthus to Mount Cyllene. The inhabitants of these tracts could not possibly have a Capital, for the narrow margin along the north coast of Achaia never widens till you reach the isthmus or the plain of Elis, and so likewise as regards Ætolia ; there is nowhere room for a large town. Wherever there was a rich valley or plateau of arable land in Greece, there you find capital cities. The plain of Sparta is the richest of all, then those of Argos and Messene; Tegea and Mantinea occupy a high but rich and level plateau; Megalopolis a lower, but equally rich plain; Athens is surrounded by arable land; and so all through Greece. The Achæans and Arcadians—for there is no distinction to be drawn when we leave the coast—and the Phocians and Ætolians were shepherds, wandering up and down the mountains as the seasons changed, and living a poor and frugal life. Hence they had long been the recognised mercenaries of the Greek world. No doubt the campaigns of Alexander induced this fashion to spread to every state in Greece. But the more civilised and luxurious Greeks were inferior both in strength and endurance to the mountaineers, and also came later into the field. Hence these adventurers reaped the first and far the richest harvest when El Dorado was discovered in the East. It was the wealth which these people brought home that produced that sudden and curious rise in their importance which is the main feature of the politics of Hellenistic Greece. The Ætolians are spoken of as rolling in wealth, luxuriating in public buildings, pictures, and statues. The Achæan League, as we know it, is an aristocratic, or rather plutocratic league, arranged with a view to give the rich preponderance. Is this likely to have been tolerated if a large part of the population consisted of poor and roving shepherds?

Polybius, in his account of the rise of the Achæan League, omits this cause altogether; but I think his explanation of the phenomenon quite inadequate, and that of rather a blind partisan. Originally, no doubt, they were remarkable neither for wealth nor extraordinary courage (ii. 38). But that applies to the days before Alexander, and they were then accordingly obscure. He attributes their rise—(1) To the consistently democratic character of their institutions—a statement not to be reconciled with the frequent tyrannies among them; (2) to their recognised honesty as umpires in many international disputes, just as one might cite the honesty of the Swiss or Belgians, because Geneva nowadays, or Brussels, is neutral ground, where greater powers have brought their quarrels into court. But how, I should like to know, can these causes explain the parallel growth of the Ætolian League, to which he denies all respectable qualities? My explanation, on the contrary, answers in both cases, and is an undoubted vera causa, which is the only philosophical cause to accept. ||

But the career of Alexander himself was too brief—like a terrible meteor—to allow social changes to take place during his campaign. The feelings, however, and the facts, which we have reviewed, a foretaste of what was to come, were briefly these. First, the rapid and complete antiquating of patriotic politics and politicians in Greece, who could henceforth aspire to nothing beyond communal liberty for the Greek cities. All liberty of domination was gone for ever. Secondly, the persistence of the older patriots in their foolish and senseless opposition to Macedonia. We cannot but blame them, though we may excuse them. The march of events was fabulously rapid and wonderful, such as the world has never seen since. How could elderly men brought up in narrow views possibly comprehend it? There resulted, thirdly, a feeling of contempt and dislike of Macedonians towards Greeks, and an inclination to deny them a share in the spoil, in spite of the desire of Alexander and the best of his generals to identify themselves with the Greeks, and fuse Hellenic culture with Macedonian force. This antagonism is an active element of disturbance, and of loss to the Greeks, in the coming century. Fourthly, this feeling was intensified as regards the home politicians of Greece, by the fact that the two best classes of the population abandoned politics, and left it to the old, the venal, and the crotchety. For the energetic went off to seek better fortunes and larger scope in Asia, and the thoughtful retired from public life into the schools of philosophy or the path of letters. Fifthly, the conditions of wealth were rapidly changing. Poor men were coming back rich, and nations of mercenaries were becoming richer than nations of traders or husbandmen. The amount of ready money, moreover, had increased enormously, and caused a rise in prices disastrous to people who lived on fixed incomes.

So far I have spoken only of Greece proper; let us say something, before concluding this chapter, on the condition of Asia Minor and the isles. We are very badly informed about these important and populous communities, for a very obvious reason. Their geographical position had brought them constantly under the very mild and lax despotism of Persian kings and satraps, so that they had forgotten to make much ado about degrees of theoretical liberty, and had turned instead to the pursuit of material prosperity. I take Corinth in actual Greece to have been the type of these rich and stirring cities—Ephesus, Colophon, Smyrna, Magnesia, and others. Corinth was always one of the centres of Greece as regards wealth, culture, and commerce. But through the greater part of Greek history it takes little independent action in politics, and rather falls in with the keener action of far smaller towns like Sicyon, or of poorer states. The Asiatic towns depended altogether on keeping up good relations with the interior, which gave them great opportunities of wealth by means of transit or carrying trade. For as culture, and with it luxury, increased, there must have been an increasing mutual demand for the special products of Greece and of Asia. These towns, then, were mostly content with any strong government which allowed them local independence, and did not interfere with their trade by heavy duties.

A peculiar class formed an important exception. These were the island cities, which were secure from land attack, and could only be held by a power which possessed maritime supremacy. Such towns demanded one thing only, but one thing absolutely—the safety of the water-ways. As soon as the maritime supremacy became laxly administered, or was disputed, the seas swarmed with those freebooters who were hardly looked on as criminals in earlier Greek society—perhaps on account of the exorbitant profits of early merchantmen. The idea of federation among these cities, and the establishment of a joint control, was not yet carried out, though the project must have been in the air. We see, moreover, the better position of the island cities by the fact that such coast settlements as could wall out the mainland and become practically islands, only assailable by sea, did so with care. Such were Halicarnassus, Pontic Heraclea, Byzantium, and others.

Of the interior of these communities, or of their social life, we know hardly a word. The exactions to which they were exposed during the next fifty years of war were such that had not their wealth been very great they must have been totally ruined. But in many respects they were no doubt important vehicles for Hellenism, stepping-stones between purer Greece and purer Asia; intermediate in culture and in political sentiments.

As regards their politics, we have one fact, or set of facts, which illustrates more clearly than anything I know the complete inanity of the enthusiasm for democracy which is so much talked about as the cardinal political virtue of the Greeks. The Macedonians are set down as the destroyers of liberty in Greece, because they everywhere put themselves in relation to an oligarchy, or small aristocracy, which they attached to their interests, and through which they held Greece quiet, or at least controlled it. Hence they abolished in Athens and elsewhere low franchise, manhood suffrage, and those other 'palladia of liberty' so fashionable even nowadays. But how vain the accusation, and how shallow, appears from the conduct of Alexander in Asia Minor. There too the Persians had long pursued a policy analogous to that of Philip of Macedon; they held the coast and island cities in check by the influence of a small number of men in each place, and so favoured oligarchy. Alexander reversed this policy in Asia, and brought to power the democracies which the Persians had gradually abolished.¹ Whether this was indeed a wise measure may well be doubted. It might have been easy enough to bring the oligarchies into the same relation to the conqueror of Darius as they had been to that monarch, and no doubt such a set of governments would have been far more manageable and more faithful than newly restored and turbulent democracies.

But apparently Alexander did not take the trouble to establish this far-seeing policy. It was enough for him to upset the adherents of Persia and establish their opponents in every city. Thus the so-called tyrant and abolisher of liberty in Greece appeared as the liberator and democratic champion of Asia Minor. The fact was that to him all such distinctions were idle, as they were to all the deeper thinkers of the day. The real question was to have a just government, and secure men's personal liberties in each state by a stable and moderate control. When the Greeks revolted in 330 B.C., and had been conquered in Arcadia by Antipater, he gave them easy terms; he paid the compliment to Athenian sentiment of sending them back from Susa the ancient statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton, which had once been the sole ornament of the platform over the agora (known to all earlier Athenians as the orchestra), and which had been carried away by Xerxes.

¹ Mardonius had actually established them in earlier days, when he found the tyrants unpopular and untrustworthy. Yet Herodotus (vi. 43) evidently expected his readers to think it impossible that Persia should favour democracy.

It strikes us as all the more strange that just before the close of his life he should have sent to Greece two orders, very oppressive,—the one to sentiment, the other to social arrangements,—namely, that he should receive Divine honours, and that all exiles should return to their homes. Sentimental grievances are, as we know, very deep-seated and hard to cure, but still there was room in the Greek Olympus for another deity without any serious revolution; there was no room in most Greek states for exiles without new banishments and new confiscations, for the property of the exiles was divided and occupied—in some cases even for the second generation; it had passed into new hands; how was the returning crowd of men, most of them paupers, to be provided for? How were their claims upon their old property to be settled? The evidence we have is so fragmentary that a general conclusion as to the conduct of these matters throughout the Greek world is hardly warranted. But this much seems certain, that while no state in Greece thought fit to make the religious question a casus belli, the Athenians and Ætolians were very determined to fight out the question of the exiles. On the other hand the inscriptions found at several cities of Asia Minor attest the appointment of a small commission of citizens (three or five) to arbitrate these difficult questions of property in a legal way. Though we may infer that the royal domain around most of the Asiatic cities may have been applied with the king's consent to mitigate the difficulty, yet even without this we might have anticipated much more docility in the Asiatic Greeks than in their European brethren; and that is what our scanty evidence points out.

To the Athenians and Spartans and their neighbours it was a warning that Alexander was tired of condoning disloyalty, and that if they persisted in a war of sentiment against him, not even their treaty of Corinth, with its guarantee of internal autonomy, would serve them. For they were the most obstinate opponents of his great idea—the fusion of nationalities. The Macedonians complained, and even openly revolted, but were persuaded or subdued; the Asiatics, even the great Persian barons who fought him almost to extermination in Sogdiana, had loyally accepted him at last. These Greek patriots were the only hopeless irreconcilables. So the increasing impatience of opposition in Alexander drove him to regard their persistence as intolerable, and he let loose upon them, if I may so say, 20,000 wanderers, most of them trained soldiers, who would form a nucleus of adherents in every city, and at all events so occupy the Greeks as to make them turn from their snarling criticisms to more serious questions at home.

The death of Alexander stopped the carrying out of these designs, but the picture left us of the host of exiles assembling at the holy truce of Olympia, and there meeting not only their friends but their enemies and their supplanters, tells us plainly what agitation there must have been throughout Greece. How many must have hurried to take their money out of visible property, and place it in invisible, as it was then termed! How many must have entrusted it to foreign guest-friends, or to roving merchants, when they foresaw the prompt return of the embittered exiles to their homes !

Yet this agitation, the chief kind of agitation which disturbed the cities of Hellenistic Greece, came after a quiet period, only once disturbed since the accession of Alexander. Niebuhr tells us in his Lectures that he used to dispute with his friend Thiersch, who thought it a very happy period at Athens, and consequently through Greece. Niebuhr, brought up in the terrible days of Napoleon's despotism in Germany, and in the glories of the Wars of Liberation, thought it a miserable time, for he sees the whole period through the eyes of Demosthenes, and the so-called patriot party who have left us their complaints.

The course of this book will lead us to form our own judgment on this question. Suffice it here to say that the short life of Alexander epitomises the whole history of Hellenism. There were within it periods of quiet, when people went to hear orations and comedies, when philosophers had their schools undisturbed, and art and commerce flourished ; other days also of anxiety, when property and even communal liberty—the only sort now to be hoped for—were in jeopardy. For from this time the Greek cities cease to be imperial, or capitals in the proper sense, and become distinctly provincial. Their highest aim is culture, both of intellect and taste, and as universities only, or as art centres, can they retain the interest of the world. On the other hand, the life of kings and of their courts is already determined by the great prototype which they all copy, but afar off—the royalty and court of Alexander. From him and his court was derived a type of capital and of king, which is found in all the kingdoms of the day, and which contributed perhaps more than anything to fix the character of the succeeding century. Some account, there-adventuring ourselves into the s desert of wars which, as has alrea deterred students from penetrati of the age which lie within and l

then, by way of contrast, seek to s in the Greek provinces of the Ma the kings were disputing for suprem.
is over, and the form and compa determined, we shall find all the c approximating, and running into one monarchs essaying to do what Ptolen first with lasting success, and Attalus t independently or not, with a talent v five, if it did not equal Ptolemy's ten.

Let me insist on one point mor chapter. Modern as were the Greeks still more of the Demosthenic age, if the Dark or Middle Ages in Europe, t istic age ancient and quaint. No poli to them, no artist, save the sculptor imitating them. The luxury, the l license, the languor of the age are thos days and of the most hellenic .

CHAPTER II

THE REVOLUTION IN HELLENIC LIFE MADE BY ALEXANDER

THERE was no king throughout all the Eastern world in the third century B.C. who did not set before him Alexander as the ideal of what a monarch ought to be. His transcendent figure so dominates the imagination of his own and the following age, that from studying his character we can draw all the materials for the present chapter. For this purpose the brilliant sketch of Plutarch, who explicitly professes to write the life and not the history of the king, is on the whole more instructive than the detailed chronicle of Arrian. From both we draw much that is doubtful and even fabulous, but much also which is certain and of unparalleled interest, as giving us a picture of the most extraordinary man that ever lived. The astonishing appearance of this lad of twenty, hurried to the throne by his father's death, in the midst of turmoil within and foes without, surrounded by doubtful friends and timid advisers, without treasury, without allies—and yet at once and without hesitation asserting his military genius, defeating his bravest enemies, cowing his disloyal subjects, crushing sedition, and then starting to conquer Asia, and to weld together two continents by a new policy—this wonder was indeed likely to fascinate the world, and if his successors aped the leftward inclination of his head and

...tion in Greece was perfectly novel, in Hellenic training, language, and ideas Hellenic thing—royalty.¹ For generations kings had been trying to assert themselves
They had succeeded in having their style accepted—an undeniable gain in those days claims were as yet hardly established. It entertained great poets at their court, and tragedies composed for the benefit of them none of them, not even Philip, who was just been accepted as a really naturalised Greek.
come closer to it than his predecessors; his youth in the glorious Thebes of Epaminondas himself carefully in the rhetoric of Athens, pose speeches and letters which passed muster fastidious stylists as Demosthenes. But to assume Greek manners and speak good Greek moments, when on his good behaviour, it was relaxations were of a very different kind. Of the Thracian⁸—then his Macedonian breed

Nevertheless he saw so clearly the importance

¹ As Herodotus (ix. 45) had long since expressed Alexander in a striking phrase ἡellenιστὴς—

this higher level that he spared no pains to educate his son, and with him, his son's court, in the highest culture. We know not whether it was accident or his clear judgment of human character which made him choose Aristotle as Alexander's tutor,—there were many other men employed to instruct him,—but we feel how foreign must have been Aristotle's conversation at the palace and among the boon companions of Philip, and hence Mieza, a quiet place away from court, was chosen for the prince's residence. There Aristotle made a Hellene of him in every real sense. It is likely, if we compare Alexander's manifesto to Darius with what is called Philip's letter, that he did not write so well as his father;¹ but he learned to know and love the great poets, and to associate with men of culture and of sober manners. Every one testifies to the dignity and urbanity of his address, even if at late and intimate carouses he rather bored the company with self-assertion and boasting. But this social defect was not unknown among the purest Hellenes. All through his life he courted Greek letters, he attended Greek plays, he talked in Greek to Greek men, and we can see how deep his sympathy with Hellenedom was from his cutting remark—in vino veritas—to two Greeks sitting at the fatal banquet where the Macedonian veteran, Clitus, broke out into indecent altercation. 'Don't you feel like demi-gods among savages when you are sitting in company with these Macedonians?'² It may be said that Hellenedom was less

¹ Arrian, ii. 14. Cf. also Æschines, de Fals. Leg. c. 18, on Philip's accomplishments.

² Even in Polybius Macedonians occupy a doubtful position, being sometimes spoken of as Greeks and sometimes not. E. Curtius, G.G. iii. 397, shows that the hesitation to accept them as Greeks arose, not from their strange language—the Hellenic Acarnanians spoke barbarously—but from their inferior culture. Their language is proved by Fick to be substantially Greek. I note that the Egyptian demotic documents always speak of them as Greeks.

his place among the p
to the most respectable barbaria such as the Spartan Pausanias, wa character from the temptations c than a Macedonian or a Roman.

But on the other hand he was novel and foreign to the Greeks.
king, the King of Persia, as a legi great splendour, but over barbaria to grant such a thing as a king over importance ; but a king over Greeks
the word, had not existed since the da
There were indeed tyrants, plenty o them mild men and fond of culture, respectable men ; and there were the
the former were always regarded as garded by the Church in the Middl virtues were of no account and whose able ; to murder them was a heroic de previous sins. On the other hand, the tary, respected generals of an oligarchy, were the ephors. Neither of these c the idea of a sovran as the Spartan kings had long lost, if they ever possessed, the rights of Menelaus, who could offer to give a friend seven inhabited towns as a gift, while they only retained the religious pre-eminence of their pedigree, the kings of Macedonia had preserved all their ancient privileges. Grote thinks them the best representatives of that prehistoric sovranity which we find in the Greece of Homer.¹ But all through his history he urges upon us the fact that there was no settled constitutional limit to the authority of the kings even in cases of life and death. On the other hand, German inquirers, who are better acquainted with absolute monarchy, see in the assembly of free Macedonians—sometimes convened, especially in cases of high treason—a check like that of the Commons in earlier England. There seem in fact to have been two powers, both supreme, which could be brought into direct collision any day, and so might produce a dead-lock only to be removed by a trial of strength. Certain it is that Macedonian kings often ordered to death, or to corporal punishment and torture, free citizens and even nobles. It is equally certain that the kings often formally appealed to an assembly of soldiers or of peers (ἐταῖροι) to decide in cases of life and death. Such inconsistencies are not impossible where there is a recognised divine right of kings, and when the summoning of an assembly lies altogether in the king's hands. Except in time of war, when its members were together under arms, the assembly had probably no way of combining for a protest, and the low condition of their civilisation made them indulgent to acts of violence on the part of their chiefs.

Niebuhr, however (Vorträge, ii. 371), suggests a very probable solution of this difficulty. He compares the case of the Frankish kings, who were only princes among their own free men, but absolute lords over lands which they conquered. Thus many individual kings came to exercise absolute power illegally by transferring their rights as conquerors to those cases where they were limited monarchs. It is very possible too that both they and the Macedonian kings would prefer as household officers nobles of the conquered lands, over whom they had absolute control. Thus the constitutional and the absolute powers of the king might be confused, and the extent of either determined by the force of the man who occupied the throne.

¹ Cf. E. Curtius, G.G. iii. 397.

That Alexander exerted his supreme authority over all his subjects is quite certain. And yet in this he differed absolutely from a tyrant, such as the Greeks knew, that he called together his peers and asked them to pass legal sentence upon a subject charged with grave offences against the king. No Greek tyrant ever could do this, for he had around him no halo of legitimacy, and moreover, he permitted no order of nobility among his subjects.

It appears that for a long time back the relations of king and nobles had been in Macedonia much as they were in the Middle Ages in Europe. There were large landed proprietors, and many of them had sovran rights in their own provinces. Not only did the great lords gather about the king as their natural head, but they were proud to regard themselves as his personal servants, and formed the household, which was known as the θεσπιαία in Hellenistic times. Earlier kings had adopted the practice of bringing to court noble children, to be the companions of the prince, and to form an order of royal pages; so no doubt Greek language and culture had been disseminated among them, and perhaps this was at first the main object. But in Alexander's time they were a permanent part of the king's household, and were brought up in his personal service, to become his aides-de-camp and his lords-in-waiting as well as his household brigade of both horse and foot guards, and perform for him many semi-menial offices which great lords and ladies are not ashamed to perform for royalty, even up to the present day.¹

I will add but one more point, which is a curious illustration of the position of the Macedonian kings among their people. None of them contented themselves with one wife, but either kept concubines, like all the kings in Europe, and even in England till George III., or even formally married second wives, as did Philip and Alexander. These practices led to constant and bloody tragedies in the royal family. Every king of Macedon who was not murdered by his relations was at least conspired against by them. What is here, however, of consequence, is the social position of the royal bastards. They take their place not with the dishonoured classes, but among the nobles, and are all regarded as legitimate pretenders to the throne.

I need not point out to the reader the curious analogies of mediæval European history. The facts seem based on the idea that the blood of kings was superior to that of the highest noble, and that even when adulterated by an ignoble mother, it was far more sacred than that of any subject. The Macedonians had not indeed advanced to the point of declaring all marriages with subjects morganatic, but they were not very far from it ; for they certainly suffered from all the evils which English history as well as other histories can show, where alliances of powerful subjects with the sovran are permitted.

¹ 'At the court of Louis XIV.,' says Buckle (Civilisation, i. 615, orig. ed.), 'the most serious misunderstandings arose as to who should have the honour of giving the king his napkin as he ate his meals, and who was to enjoy the inestimable privilege of helping on the queen with her shift.' 'According to some authorities, a man ought to be a duke before his wife could be allowed to meddle with the queen's shift. According to others, the lady-in-waiting, whoever she might be, had the right, unless a princess happened to be present.' For these facts he cites contemporary authorities. See also his delightful account (op. cit. pp. 610 sq.) of the great conflict in France about the right of sitting in the king's presence: 'In comparison with this a mere struggle for political liberty faded into insignificance; and what made it still more exciting to the minds of the nobles was the extreme difficulty with which this great social problem was beset.' The details are most amusing, but would lead us away too far.

Thus Alexander stood forth really and thoroughly in the position assigned by Herodotus to his elder namesake—ἄνθρωπος Ἕλληνα, a Greek man in pedigree, education, and culture, καὶ Μακεδόνων βασιλεύς, and king of the Macedonians, a position unknown and unrecognised in the Greek world since the days of that Iliad which the conqueror justly prized, as to him the best and most sympathetic of all Hellenic literature. Let us add that in the text, which Aristotle revised for him, there were assertions of royalty, including the power of life and death, which are expunged from our texts.¹ He had the sanction of divine right, but what was far more important, the practical control of life and death, regarding the nobility as his household servants, and the property of his subjects as his own, keeping court with considerable state, and in every respect expressing, as M. Grote says, the principle l'Etat c'est moi.²

A very few words will point out what changes were made in this position by his wonderful conquests. Though brought up in considerable state, and keeping court with all the splendour which his father's increased kingdom and wealth could supply, he was struck with astonishment, we are told, at the appointments of Darius's tents, which he captured after the battle of Issus. When he went into the bath prepared for his opponent, and found all the vessels of pure gold, and smelt the whole chamber full of frankincense and myrrh, and then passed out into a lofty dining tent with splendid hangings, and with the appointments of an oriental feast, he exclaimed to his staff: 'Well, this is something like royalty.' Accordingly there was no part of Persian dignity which he did not adopt. We hear that the expenses of his table—he always dined late—rose to about £400 daily, at which limit he fixed it. Nor is this surprising when we find that he dined as publicly as the kings of France in the old days, surrounded by a brilliant staff of officers and pages, with a bodyguard present, and a trumpeter ready to summon the household troops.¹ All manner of delicacies were brought from the sea and from remote provinces for his table.²

¹ πὰρ γὰρ ἐμοὶ θάνατος, says Agamemnon, in a citation made by Aristotle himself from the Iliad, Pol. iii. 9, 2.

² History of Greece, x. 62.

In other respects, in dress and manners, he drifted gradually into Persian habits also. The great Persian lords, after a gallant struggle for their old sovran, loyally went over to his side. Both his wives were oriental princesses, and perhaps too little has been said by historians about the influence they must have had in recommending to him Persian officers and pages. The loyalty of these people, great aristocrats as they were, was quite a different thing from that of the Macedonians, who had always been privileged subjects, and who now attributed to their own prowess the king's mighty conquests. The orientals, on the other hand, accepted him as an absolute monarch, nay, as little short of a deity, to whom they readily gave the homage of adoration. It is a characteristic story that when the rude and outspoken Casander had just arrived at Babylon for the first time, on a mission from his father Antipater, the regent of Macedonia, he saw orientals approaching Alexander with their customary prostrations, and burst out laughing. Upon this Alexander was so enraged that he seized him by the hair and dashed his head against the wall, and there can be little doubt that the king's death, which followed shortly, saved Casander from a worse fate. Thus the distinction pointed out by Niebuhr (above, p. 21), would lead Alexander to prefer the orientals, whom he had conquered, and who were his absolute property, to the Macedonians, who were not only constantly grumbling but had even planned several conspiracies against him.

¹ Plut. Alex. 20. His circle included from sixty to seventy guests. Others add that whenever he offered libation at table the trumpet sounded that all the army might know the king drank. To us this custom is familiar from Shakespeare's Hamlet. Ehippus, Agatharchides, and others, quoted by Athenæus, xii. 538 sq. (or cf. the Frags. in C. Müller's Arrian, Ed. Didot) exhaust themselves in describing the luxury of the court.

² We hear of tamed lions in his train, and of the efforts of his stewards to naturalise Macedonian flora in the royal gardens at Babylon. It was noted that all attempts at growing ivy in that dry and hot climate failed.

There was yet another feature in Alexander's court which marks a new condition of things. The keeping of a regular court journal, ἐφημερίδες, wherein the events of each day were carefully registered, gave an importance to the court which it had never before attained within Greek or Macedonian experience. The daily bulletins of his last illness are still preserved to us by Arrian and Plutarch from these diaries.¹

¹ The Royal Diary (or Court Journal) gives the following account, to the effect that he revelled and drank at the dwelling of Medius; then rose up, took a bath, and slept; then again supped at the house of Medius, and again drank till far into the night. After retiring from the drinking party he again took a bath, after which he took a little food, and slept there, because he already felt feverish. He was carried out upon a couch for the sacrifices, in order that he might offer them, according to his daily custom. After performing the sacred rites he lay down in the banqueting hall till dusk. In the meantime he gave instructions to the officers about the expedition and voyage, ordering those who were going by land to be ready on the fourth day, and those who were going to sail to join him on the fifth day. From this place he was carried upon the couch to the river, where he got into a boat and sailed across the river to the park. There he again took a bath, and went to rest.

In addition to this we hear that he sent home constant and detailed public despatches to his mother and Antipater, in which he gave the minutest details of his life.

On the following day he took another bath, and offered the customary sacrifices. He then entered a tester-bed, and chatted with Medius. He also ordered his officers to meet him at daybreak. Having done this he ate a little supper, and was again conveyed into the tester-bed. The fever now raged the whole night without intermission. The next day he took a bath, after which he offered sacrifices, and gave orders to Nearchus and the other officers that the voyage should take place on the third day. The next day he bathed again, and offered the prescribed sacrifices. After performing the sacred rites he got no relief from the fever. Notwithstanding this, he summoned his officers and gave them instructions to have all things ready for the starting of the fleet. In the evening he took a bath, after which he was very ill. The next day he was transferred to the house near the swimming baths, where he offered the prescribed sacrifices. Though he was now very dangerously ill he summoned the most responsible of his officers, and gave them fresh instructions about the voyage. On the following day he was with difficulty carried out to the sacrifices, which he offered; and none the less gave more orders to the officers about the voyage. The next day, though he was no better, he offered the prescribed sacrifices. He now gave orders that the generals should remain in attendance in the hall, and that the inferior commanders should remain at the gates. But being now in a most dangerous condition, he was carried from the park into the palace. When his officers entered the room he knew them indeed, but could no longer utter a word, being speechless. During the ensuing night and day, and the next night and day, he was in very high fever.

Such is the account given in the Royal Diary. In addition to this it states that the soldiers were very desirous of seeing him; and then there are details added which were not in the Diary.

This translation is from Mr. Chinnock's Arrian, vii. 25, 26. It will be noticed that Alexander's assumption of divine attributes did not hinder his sacrificing to the traditional gods. The reader will also remark the absence of all mention of the Queen Roxane, or of any intercourse with her household. This was probably a matter of etiquette in the Court Journal, which was framed on oriental models.

In these the public learned a new kind of ideal of pleasure as well as of business. Brought up in a much colder climate than Greece, among mountains which gave ample opportunity for sport, the Macedonian king was so far not a 'Greek man' that he was far less frugal as regards his living, and had very different notions of amusement. The Hellene, who was mostly a townsman, living in a country of dense cultivation, was beholden to the gymnasium and palæstra for his recreation, of which the highest outcome was the Olympian and other games, where he could attain glory by competition in athletic meetings. The men who prize this sort of recreation are always abstemious and careful about keeping the body in hard condition by diet and special exercising of muscles. The Macedonian ideal was quite different, and more like our country gentleman's notion, who can afford to despise bodily training in the way of abstinence, who eats and drinks what he likes, nay, often drinks to excess, but works off evil effects by those field sports which have always produced the finest type of man,—hunting, shooting, fishing—in fact the life of the natural or savage man reproduced with artificial improvements.

Alexander took the Macedonian side strongly against the Greek in these matters. He is said to have retorted upon the people who advised him to run in the sprint race at Olympia, that he would do so when he found kings for competitors. But the better reason was that he despised that kind of bodily training; he would not have condescended to give up his social evenings, at which he drank freely; and above all he so delighted in hunting that he felt no interest in athletic meetings. When he got into the preserves of Darius he fought the lion and the bear, and incurred such personal danger that his adventures were commemorated by his fellow-sportsmen in bronze. He felt and asserted that this kind of sport, requiring not only courage and coolness but quick resource, was the proper training for war, in contrast to the athletic habit of body, which was admitted to produce dulness of mind and sleepiness of body.

This way of spending the day in the pursuit of large game, and then coming home to a late dinner and a jovial carouse, where the events of the day are discussed and parallel anecdotes brought out, was so distinctive as to produce a marked effect on the social habits of succeeding generations. The older Spartans had indeed similar notions; they despised competitions in the arena, and spent their time hunting in the wilds of Mount Taygetus; but the days for Sparta to influence the world were gone by, and indeed none but Arcadians and Ætolians had like opportunities.

It would require a separate treatise to discuss fully the innovations made by Alexander in the art of war. But here it is enough to notice, in addition to Philip's abandonment of citizen for professional soldiers, the new development Alexander gave to cavalry as the chief offensive branch of military service. He won all his battles by charges of heavy cavalry, while the phalanx formed merely the defensive wing of his line. He was even breaking up the phalanx into lighter order at the time of his death. So it came that the noblest and most esteemed of his Companions were cavalry officers, and from this time onward no general thought of fighting, like Epaminondas, a battle on foot. Eastern warfare also brought in the use of elephants, but this was against the example of Alexander, who did not use them in battle, so far as we know.

In one point, however, he still held to old and chivalrous ways, and so fell short of our ideal of a great commander.

He always charged at the head of his cavalry, and himself took part in the thickest of the fight. Hence in every battle he ran the risk of ending the campaign with his own life. It may be said that he had full confidence in his fortune, and that the king's valour gave tremendous force to the charge of his personal companions. But nothing can convince us that Hannibal's view of his duties was not far higher, of whom it was noted that he always took ample care for his own safety, nor did he ever, so far as we know, risk himself as a combatant. Alexander's example, here as elsewhere, gave the law, and so a large proportion of his successors found their death on the battlefield. The aping of Alexander was apparently the main cause of this striking result.

Modern historians are divided as regards Alexander into two classes, first, those like Grote, who regard him as a partly civilised barbarian, with a lust for conquest, but with no ideas of organisation or of real culture beyond the establishment of a strong military control over a vast mass of heterogeneous subjects. Secondly, those like Droysen, who are the majority, and have better reasons on their side, feel that the king's genius in fighting battles was not greater than his genius in founding cities, not merely as outposts, but as marts, by which commerce and culture should spread through the world. He is reported to have disputed with Aristotle, who wished him to treat the orientals like a master—δεσποτικῶς—and to have asserted that his policy was to treat them as their leader—ἡγεμονικῶς. We know from Aristotle's Politics that with all his learning the philosopher had not shaken off Hellenic prejudices, and that he regarded the Eastern nations as born for slavery. Apart from the questionable nature of his theory, he can have known little of the great Aryan barons of Bactriana or Sogdiana, who had for centuries looked on the Greek adventurers they met as the Romans did in later days. But Alexander belongs to a different age from Aristotle, as different as Thucydides from Herodotus, and he determined to carry out the 'marriage of Europe and Asia.' To a Hellene the marriage with a foreigner would seem a more or less disgraceful concubinage. The children of such a marriage could not inherit in any petty Greek state. Now the greatest Macedonian nobles were allied to Median and Persian princesses, and the Greeks who had attained high official position at court, such as Eumenes, the chief secretary, were only too proud to be admitted to the same privilege.

The fashion of making or cementing alliances by marriages becomes from this time a feature of the age. The kings who are one day engaged in deadly war are the next connected as father and son-in-law, or as brothers-in-law. No solemn peace seems to be made without a marriage, and yet these marriages seldom hinder the breaking out of new wars.

All the Greek historians blame the Persian tendencies of Alexander, his assumption of oriental dress and of foreign ceremonial. There was but one of his officers, Peukestas, who loyally followed his chief, and who was accordingly rewarded by his special favour. Yet if we remember Greek prejudices, and how trivial a fraction of the empire the Greeks were in population, we may fairly give Alexander credit for more judgment than his critics. No doubt the Persian dress was far better suited to the climate than the Macedonian. No doubt he felt that a handful of Macedonians could never hold a vast empire without securing the sympathy of the conquered. At all events he chose to do the thing his own way, and who will say that he should have done it as his critics prescribe?

CHAPTER III

THE DIADOCHI AS EXECUTORS OF ALEXANDER'S IDEAS

WHEN all the world was assembled or represented in Babylon, and was strained with anxiety at Alexander's great preparations, men's hearts quaking and failing them for fear, a blow came terrible beyond all expectation. The angel of death subdued the unconquerable king; in a few days of raging fever brought on by excess of sociality, he became speechless, then came the news that he was dead. It was impossible even for Q. Curtius, in his flights of rhetoric, to exaggerate the effects of that news. For if the master had been terrible, and kept men speechless with fear, how much more dreadful was the empire adrift without a guide! Alexander in his twelve years of sovereignty, and his almost constant pursuit of new conquests, had not matured his system, or carried out distinctly his plans of unifying the empire. Many things were begun, many schemes projected, but Alexander had no time to complete them. Nor would he have given himself the time, so long as the fever of conquest was upon him. When advancing age had begun to tame that fiery spirit, and fatigue those muscles of iron, then indeed might the world have expected great things from his organising genius. But now his work had fallen unfinished from his master-hand, and who could accomplish it? Like all the greatest conquerors, he had no single lieutenant in whom he or others trusted, as the proper successor to his power. He had, on the contrary, as is always the case, a large staff of highly-trained officers, of skilful civil servants, all jealous of his favour, and of their rivals, and only kept from breaking out into open quarrels by his constraining hand. In the case of Hephæstion and Craterus, who crossed swords in his presence, he was obliged solemnly to threaten to put either both, or the assailant, to death if such a thing happened again, though they were his two dearest friends in all the household.

Under these circumstances we might almost predict that as no one successor could take up the whole inheritance, everything must either be undone and fall into confusion during the struggles for the division of plunder; or else many of the conquered kingdoms must return to their old condition; or lastly, the ideas of Alexander might be carried out on a small scale, and within moderate limits, by the most cautious and careful of his imitators. All these results did in turn ensue, but the most remarkable feature is the apparent inability of the Greek-speaking world to fall back into the old grooves so dear to Hellenic patriots. The tyrant was dead, they may often have exclaimed; the tyranny yet lives.

It is my intention to sketch out the broad features of the great struggles of the next forty-five years, so as to show what the main issues were, and how far the principal successors (Diadochi) carried out the policy of Alexander. The lesser men, the side issues, the cross purposes, the confusion of parties, must all be omitted. It is owing to these complicating elements that this period is a sealed book to the ordinary reader, and is hardly to be mastered even by the most painstaking student. But until we have learned, what old historians never learned, that wars and marches in themselves have no interest, and are only accidentally part of human history, we shall never be able to clear the birth of Hellenism from the darkness which broods over it.

Yet the main issues were very clear. It was quite fixed in the minds of all the chief captains that each should have a kingdom, or rather province, as satrap, in which he intended to secure himself permanently. But at the same time the affection and respect of the soldiery for Alexander were so great that no one could dare to dispossess his heirs—unfortunately a foolish lad, half-brother of Alexander, Philip Arridæus; a posthumous infant; and the widowed queen Roxane, who had promptly got rid of her rival Statira, lately married at the great wedding feast in Babylon. It was thought decent and was required by the army that a general regent or protector should be appointed to manage the Empire for these minors till the son of Alexander came of age. Of course Perdikkas, the first appointed of these regents, thought to wrest all power to himself, and to coerce his former colleagues. And of course this attempt failed, despite the support of the able Eumenes, who was ready to fight the royal cause as the only safe one for a Greek among Macedonians. Perdikkas's first attempt to enforce his authority and to subdue Ptolemy in Egypt ended with his defeat and death.

With a new division of provinces, caused by these events, and the fall of Leonnatus and Craterus in battles against the Greeks and against Eumenes, whose position was gone with Perdikkas's death, the royal family passed into the keeping of a new regent, the veteran Antipater, who was so loyal to them that he felt his son, Casander, was no proper successor to this office, and he bequeathed it to Polysperchon. This led to violent conflicts in Greece and Macedonia between

Polysperchon and the royal family on one hand, and Casander on the other, who ultimately asserted himself lord of Macedonia and Greece, and put to death all the remaining members of the royal family—Olympias, Philip Arridæus, and the unfortunate child Alexander. He held, from the beginning, with Ptolemy, the theory of independent satrapies securing independent kingdoms, ridiculed the rights of the royal family, and obtained the occasion to carry his policy into deadly practical effect. Meanwhile in Asia a new pretender to universal sovereignty had risen in Antigonus, perhaps the ablest of Alexander's generals, who had been at first forced to fly for his life from the regent Perdikkas, but who afterwards obtained the central province of Asia Minor for his share,¹ and soon showed that he intended to extend it as far as his resources would allow him. He subdued Eumenes after long struggles in the east of Persia; he almost seized Seleucus, satrap of Babylon, who fled for his life to Ptolemy; and thus becoming lord of all Asia he began to extend his ambition to the rest of Alexander's empire. But though ably seconded by his son Demetrius, to whom he entrusted the European part of his campaigns and the raising of the Greek provinces against Casander, he was overmatched by the combination of all the rest against him. His attack on Egypt failed, just as that of Perdikkas had failed. Demetrius, though often and brilliantly successful, was not able to subdue Casander, or indeed the power of Rhodes in alliance with him; and some successes of Ptolemy in Palestine enabled this satrap to send back Seleucus to Babylon, where he reconstituted his dominion. Another strong power had been formed by Lysimachus, now for some years satrap of Thrace, and the coalition of the four powers

¹ He had been governor for Alexander there from the beginning of the invasion of Asia, cf. below, p. 41.

—Macedonia, Thrace, Babylonia, and Egypt—proved too much for Antigonus. The long struggle, which he strove to win by attacking his enemies in detail, was decided first by the brilliant strategy of Lysimachus, who held him at bay, then by the allied powers of Thrace, Macedonia, and all the East, on the field of Ipsus (301 B.C.) The power of Seleucus was now evidently the greatest among the Diadochi. For some years longer Demetrius, Antigonus's son, kept up a war of knight-errantry about the Ægean. He was at last taken prisoner by Seleucus and died of a broken heart.

All this time Ptolemy in Egypt was quietly consolidating his kingdom, and did not even take active part in the great campaign of Ipsus. But Lysimachus gradually extended his kingdom from Thrace into Asia Minor, where he had made settlements and outpost forts from the beginning of his reign. Thus he gradually came into collision with Seleucus, who had succeeded to Antigonus's domain. But this conflict also ended with a great battle near the Hellespont, in which Lysimachus lost his life. The aged Seleucus seems to have been seized with a longing to recover the ancient home of his youth and end his days in Macedonia. He was almost master of all that Alexander had conquered. Egypt alone could have resisted. But on the very threshold of his home he was murdered by the ribald son of Ptolemy, who had been exiled from his Egyptian heritage by his politic father. This adventurer's assumption of the royalty of Macedonia was cut short by the terrible invasion of the Kelts (Galatæ), who killed him in battle, swept all Macedonia, and carried terror into Asia. The Keltic scourge, combined with the recent death of the last veteran of Alexander's staff, and the accession of a new generation of kings, closed the forty-five years' war of the Diadochi. Asia, apart from the Greek cities of the coast, remained in undisputed possession of Antiochus, Seleucus's son. Ptolemy Philadelphus was settled in Egypt and Cyrene. Of the three princes who had in turn seized the throne of Macedonia after the despatch of Casander's young and feeble sons—Demetrius, Pyrrhus of Epirus, and Lysimachus, only one had left an heir. This heir, Antigonus Gonatas, son of Demetrius, became the real founder of the house of Macedonia, with authority more or less complete over Greece. So the Hellenistic world begins a new era.

I have left out in this sketch all the secondary names, such as Peukestas, Triptolemus, Asander, not to speak of other Alexanders and Ptolemys, which bewilder the reader and have no effect on the main issues. Thus it will be seen that discounting the four important generals disposed of by death early in the struggle—Leonnatus fighting against the Greeks with Antipater, Craterus returning into Asia after the victory of Crannon, and meeting Eumenes by the way, Perdikkas in his attempt on Egypt, and Eumenes crushed by Antigonus—there remain five men who disposed of the fortunes of Alexander's Empire. These, in the order of their seniority, were Antipater of Macedonia; Antigonus of Phrygia, or rather of Western Asia; Lysimachus of Thrace; Ptolemy of Egypt; and Seleucus of Babylon or Eastern Asia.

Eumenes, indeed, deserves a word of notice, if it were only to show how deep was the gulf which separated the Greeks in Alexander's army from the Macedonians. This youth of Cardia, probably of humble origin, pushed his way even under Philip, and was promoted by Alexander to one of the most important offices in the empire; he was keeper of the Records of the Court, and chief of the Foreign Correspondence Department. He was afterwards promoted to high military rank, taking Perdikkas's place when as well as the merits of his character. As to his ability there had he been bred a Macedonian no doubt he would have held together an empire for perhaps changed the face of history. Greek birth—a cursed Chersonite the qualities it entailed. He was mean in money matters, treasure for the evil day, for he knew alone his prosperity depended. When he stood aloof, saying 'that a foreigner should meddle in the quarrels of Macedonia' their indignation afterwards when they saw Craterus had fallen in battle against him among the leaders, who had followed him with all his bling materials, not with shield and spear. In subsequent troubles he was eminently loyal and was the mainstay of their interests, but he saw that his only chance of gaining their lieutenant, not as an independent war of the Eastern satraps against Alexander and his donians, both men and leaders, found without him.

them who was a match for Antigonos, whom he could outwit even when he could not defeat him. But among the luxurious and tyrannous satraps, spoilt by long despotism and heedless extravagance under Alexander, who courted and fawned upon the soldiery 'as in a democracy,' and were ready to assassinate the Greek adventurer the day after the victory; among the abandoned veterans, perhaps an army as ruthless as the soldiers of Cortez or the grand Catalan company in Mediæval Greece, victory or defeat was equally fatal to him. His strange device of a royal tent, where the leaders met in council as lieutenants in presence of an imaginary Alexander, though it shows curious evidence for the superstitious reverence in which the king's memory was held, yet seems a sorry expedient to maintain an impossible position. Indeed, all through the career of this Greek, there is something of that weakness so often shown by the nation, a genius rather akin to astuteness than to breadth of grasp, a suppleness both of mind and body indicative rather of the clever minister than the great ruler; 'no great speaker,' says Plutarch,¹ 'but wily and persuasive, as may be seen from his despatches.'

This then was the type of Greek who foisted himself into the Macedonian empire. So long as the condition of the world was one of war, when the cavalry of Peers and the phalanx were supreme, he was sure to be treated (except in the crisis of a campaign) with insolence and disdain. But no settled court could afford to despise him, and we may be sure that many such men became the grand viziers in the palaces of the far East, while they fill in the courts of the next generation, under established kings, every post of importance. Eumenes was only forty-five at his death; he therefore belongs to the youngest of the companions of

¹ Eum. II.

Alexander, being not much older than the king himself. Let us turn back to the veterans, who regarded him not only as an upstart, but as a premature rival.

ANTIPATER, placed by his long control of Alexander's European possessions in a prominent position, was probably the best servant the king ever had. He had grown gray in Philip's service, and with Parmenio shared his confidence. But he was evidently a far abler man than Parmenio, and a general of the greatest reputation, who administered fearlessly and well in the king's interest. Small and ugly in appearance,¹ mean also in the estimation of soldiers debauched by oriental largess, he appears to have had no larger views than loyalty to the house of Philip.² He had no taste for culture, no sympathy for the Greeks; he so hated the upstart Eumenes that the latter would not venture into Macedonia after Alexander's death, and his treatment of Greek revolutions, his cold insistence upon the surrender and death of the Athenian patriots—Demosthenes, Hypereides, and others—shows his sense of duty to his cause, and his contempt of all sentimental politics. With him we can find no new ideas, no promotion of Hellenism, yet we cannot but respect the rare devotion of the old man to his master's house, which prompted him to disinherit, as it were, his son Casander, whose sentiments he well knew, and bequeath the main charge of the royal cause to his old companion in arms, Polysperchon.

Yet all the time that he was governor of Macedonia he ¹ Suidas, sub voc. Κρατερός, where he is contrasted with that officer of splendid appearance and popular manners. Cf. also Plut. l'loc. 29.

² Antigonus of Karystos told in his memoirs (Athen. x. 435 d.) that when Philip sat down to drink with his friends he used to say, 'It is enough for us if Antipater is sober,' and that he hustled the dice-board under a seat when Antipater suddenly came in upon him at his gambling. These stories show the strict and serious character borne by Antipater.

kept wearying the king with complaints of the conduct and violences of Olympias, the queen-mother. She too was not slow to write, and so Alexander was troubled between the careful and honest loyalty of Antipater, which he could not but respect, and his filial duty to the haughty mother, whom he could not cease to love. The death of Antipater, apparently from old age,¹ followed so soon upon the division at Triparadeisus, where he was declared regent, that during the great wars his part of the empire was represented by Casander, a far more interesting figure, to whom we will return when we have disposed of the older generation. It is in connection with Casander that we may mention the mischievous acts of Polysperchon, which were caused by the active opposition of that prince.

ANTIGONUS, who was killed at the great battle of Ipsus in 301 B.C., aged eighty-four, was therefore about thirty years older than Alexander, and only seventeen or eighteen years younger than Antipater, and yet there seems in him an advance towards newer ideas. Of great stature, somewhat coarse in the flavour of his wit, and apparently cultivating a sort of rude camp manner popular among the soldiers, he was yet in his ambition anything but a mere loyal officer of Philip's house, and in his culture no mere Macedonian spear-cater. Being a man over fifty, and well experienced at the time of Alexander's invasion, he was made satrap of Phrygia in 333 B.C., and remained in charge of it instead of accompanying the king's campaign. This, while it made him less familiar with Alexander's ideas, made him also an established ruler at the breaking up of the empire. He was lord of Phrygia, in fact of central Asia Minor, for over thirty years. He tried hard to found a great kingdom for himself, if possible as great as Alexander's; if not, one which should hand down his glory to posterity, and he very nearly succeeded ; but for the inaccessibility of Egypt and the cautious defensive policy of its king, but for the great strategic ability of Lysimachus, the campaign of Ipsus might have resulted in leaving his son Demetrius master of the world. His rudeness and jocularities, which gave rise to fables of his low origin, were perpetuated in many anecdotes. Not so certain to my mind are his love and patronage of letters. We know that he attached to himself, after the death of Eumenes, the historian Hieronymus of Cardia, who told his history with judicious if not with judicial impartiality. But when we hear of all manner of Greek artists being assembled at his new capital, Antigoneia on the Orontes, we may suspect the influence of his son Demetrius.

¹ He was about eighty, and died in 319 B.C.

For this father and son, among all the earlier Diadochi, stand alone in their loving and intimate union. The son of Antipater, as we have seen, was postponed by his father to a stranger, and only given the second place in the management of the empire ; the eldest son of Ptolemy was disinherited and let loose on the world to do terrible mischief ; the eldest son of Lysimachus, Agathocles, a worthy and able prince, was even assassinated by his father's orders. It was no wonder then that the historians noted how Demetrius came in from hunting armed, and went straight into the king's presence without fear or suspicion on either side. The rarity of such relations between father and son are a notable sign of the times.

Yet Antigonus belongs to the old generation. In smaller matters, such as the careful keeping of journals of his proceedings, and his attention to omens before battle, we are reminded that he was imitating Alexander. His assumption of the title king in a famous officially prepared scene¹ shows his ambition. He was clear-sighted enough to see the hopelessness of restoring the old dynasty, and that royalty was the form of government for the future; but he had no fresh ideas, no fruitful policy to act as a cement of the great kingdom he had conquered, and so his great labours resulted in nothing but confusion.

¹ Plut. Demetr. 18.

PTOLEMY stands next in age, being about twelve years older than his king, and among his early friends. He entered upon the great period of conquest at an age when a man may yet have preserved youth enough to adopt new ideas, and he succeeded in such a way that his life and work stand apart, and will require a separate chapter.

LYSIMACHUS was probably a little younger in years, and yet he belongs distinctly to the older Diadochi in character—a splendid soldier, full of energy and resource, recovering after defeat, ambitious too of power, and fond of royal state. Yet though he at one time, after long and various struggles, obtained a great kingdom, and was master of all the western empire, he made no impression on his age. We hear that Alexander told off Lysimachus, the Acarnanian, his old tutor, to learn the wisdom of the Brachmans. This must have been a very different Lysimachus, for the Thracian king is said to have expelled philosophers from his dominions. Was this owing to the court experiences of his earlier years? He was a great soldier. For a whole year he baffled the superior force of Antigonus by occupying fortified lines, and retreating safely from them just as they were about to be stormed. Even Pyrrhus, the best tactician of the younger generation, was no match for him, and could not hold Macedonia for one campaign against him.¹ Thus he held in his power Macedonia, ¹ There is a story told (Plut. Demetr. 27) of his showing the marks left on him by a lion, to which he was thrown by Alexander's orders.

Thrace, with its important coast cities, and a great part of Asia Minor, in fact, a kingdom second to none for commercial activity and for the elements of culture, yet he did nothing to cement it beyond murdering some local tyrants, and founding, like all the Diadochi, a city after his own name on the model of Alexander. The younger generation, especially Demetrius, hated him, and looked on him as vulgar, stingy, and mean. His family quarrels, in consequence of repeated marriages with ambitious princesses, brought him first to the crime of murdering his ablest son, and then to the misfortune of losing his kingdom.¹ So unpopular was his reign that when Seleucus came to avenge the children and subjects of the old man the kingdom melted from him, and he fell on the field of battle, like Antigonus, at Korupedion, near the Hellespont.

These days were days of perpetual war and tumult, when military ability was sure to bring its reward, and place a man some day in the first rank, but they were also days of the seething and reconstructing of society, when to conquer in battle was only the first step in the problem, and the warrior, if not an able and progressive politician, was sure soon to lose what he had acquired.

These qualities could only be found in men who were young in ideas as well as in years. Such was Ptolemy, and such was SELEUCUS, whose life would well deserve a chapter, like Ptolemy, if we had the necessary information.

When I read in Plutarch (Alex. 41) that he wrote to Peukestās, who was wounded by a bear, reproving him for not letting him know, and asking whether any of his fellow-sportsmen were to blame from cowardice, that he might punish them, I am disposed to think that Lysimachus's fight with the lion was owing to some affair of this kind, when he was obliged to vindicate himself against a charge of leaving a fellow-sportsman in danger. Any more serious charge, such as treason, against him would surely have been known to the historians.

¹ Cf. the summary of his history in Pausanias, i. 10.

But we only know of the great results he attained, of the strong affection he inspired, of the permanent dynasty he founded under enormous difficulties. Thus he must either have been far the ablest of the Diadochi, or he must have moulded his mind more thoroughly than the rest in the ideas of his playmate and fellow in arms, Alexander. For he was the youngest of all the original Diadochi, and probably very little older than the king. He had first distinguished himself in the great battle on the Hydaspes, and was already so prominent at Babylon that he was given the daughter of Spitamenes of Sogdiana—a great figure in the eastern provinces—to wife. Appointed at the first division of the empire by Perdikkas to be second in command (Chiliarch), he was at the second division, at Triparadeisus (321 B.C.), made satrap of Babylon. Here he settled himself, and was so occupied with the consolidation of his power that we hardly hear of him till Antigonos came back from the south-east provinces, after conquering Eumenes, with such power and pretensions that Seleucus fled for his life, and was an exile with Ptolemy in Egypt (316 B.C.) But as soon as the Egyptian's successes in Phœnicia permitted it, Ptolemy sent back his visitor, who had helped him vigorously in his naval campaigns, to raise the east against the waxing power of his threatening neighbour Antigonos. So popular was Seleucus in his satrapy, that without an army he at once recovered it, and from that time to his death was practically lord of the east.

It is plain that his main interests lay in that direction. These provinces of the empire had never been really conquered. Even Alexander had only changed their suzerain relations. He left the local chiefs and satraps their power. Naturally such of his successors as Perdikkas and Antigonos, who obtained only momentary control, could do no more. Hence the introduction of Macedonian or Greek influence into these remote provinces was rather a matter of policy than of coercion. And this was evidently Seleucus's talent. He, like Antigonus, stood in the best relations to his son, as is proved by the curious story of his ceding him his young wife, Stratonike, the sister of Demetrius, with whom (though she was his step-mother) the youth fell madly in love; he also showed delicate consideration for Demetrius, when he at last got that firebrand into his power. He had had various struggles with him and his father. In one raid (312 B.C.) when the king was occupied in the far East, Demetrius had even taken and plundered Babylon, his capital, and committed all manner of insolent outrages. Chandragupta, the Indian king who was curtailing the Macedonian empire in the East, was also induced to make such peace and alliance that if Seleucus lost some provinces, the friendship and the enormous gifts of the Indian more than made up the loss. With the 480 elephants of Chandragupta he crushed the force of Antigonus at Ipsus. We see in him no strong personal feeling save horror at Lysimachus's offer of large bribes (2000 talents) if he would 'remove' Demetrius. This he considered the proposal of a scoundrel and a barbarian (μιαρὸν καὶ βάρβαρον). Indeed, Seleucus and Ptolemy appear to me characters not only different from the old generals we have described, but even more modern than the knight-errants of the second generation, Demetrius and Pyrrhus, who still dreamt of rivalling Alexander.

Seleucus is quite an *Epigonos*¹ in character. We know that he was beloved and understood by the orientals as much and probably more than Peukestas, who adopted their dress and language. He had wives from Sogdiana and India, as well as from Macedonia and Greece. And yet there seems in all that he does Greek culture and refinement. He indeed understood how to marry Europe and Asia, and succeeded in no small degree. But the natural difficulties in his way were enormous. Not only were the races under his sway exceedingly diverse in language, manners, and religion, but the geographical disposition of his provinces made it almost impossible for one man to defend them against energetic hostility on the frontiers. And this arose not from the size of the empire, but from the fact that it stretched across two of the great lines of separation nature has made in the Asian continent. First comes the desert of Thapsus protecting the crossing of the Euphrates—an obstacle which the Romans in after days were never able permanently to overcome. Then comes the great desert of Persia, which compels the highroad to go far round by the Parthian Gates, or, still worse, by the burning sands of Gedrosia and the sea. We know how even Alexander suffered in the snows of the Indian Caucasus (Hindukush), and again in the tropical sands of Gedrosia. This it was which made Seleucus, when the affair of his new wife's transfer was completed, send off the young couple to be rulers of the 'upper' provinces. Antiochus I. was accordingly trained and grew up in this office, and though he commanded Seleucus's cavalry at Ipsus, and was defeated by his future brother-in-law, his maturer years, up to Seleucus's death, were spent in the far East. But no efforts could weld the lands this side the Euphrates with the wild mountains of Media and Parthia. In the former were pliant, mostly Semitic, nationalities, accustomed to absolute monarchy, and caring little about changes of masters or even of government if their material interests were secure; in the latter free tribes dwelling in pasture and mountain, accustomed to be led by warrior chiefs, but of that Aryan type which we meet again in the chivalrous barons of the Middle Ages.¹

¹ The second generation of Alexander's successors are usually distinguished by this name.

But no outlying country, not even Egypt with its careful ruler, was induced to adopt Hellenic culture so thoroughly or at least so easily as Syria. There seem to be no resisting features in any of the populations excepting the Jews; and how completely even they were impregnated with Hellenism is shown by the history of the Septuagint translation, and still more of the completely Greek documents of the New Testament. But I am anticipating what belongs to much later chapters in this book. Here we are concerned with the character of Seleucus, who fortunately was the youngest of the Diadochi, and with Ptolemy, the wisest, the most politic, and the only successors who regarded war as an evil, and military glory as only the prelude to a safe and honourable peace. In his youthful intercourse with the great conqueror, in his precious four years' exile with his politic and successful cousin the King of Egypt, Seleucus had learned the lessons of the newer time, and contributed largely to the great age of cosmopolitan culture which prepared the world for the unity and peace of the Roman Empire.

¹ The epic of the Shah-name shows us how reasonable is this comparison.

CHAPTER IV

THE YOUNGER GENERATION OF DIADOCHI, AND THE PRINCESSES OF THEIR DAY

BEFORE we enter on these larger topics there remain for us some notable figures in the epoch of confusion, which belong to the newer generation, and yet have not abandoned the impossible ideal set them by Alexander—men brought up not in the camp or in campaigns, but in more or less home splendour, accustomed to the pomp of court and culture, and eminently the precursors of the new cosmopolitanism. We select here the three greatest, who made no small stir in the stormy age which begat them—Demetrius, Pyrrhus, and Casander. Though Casander was much the oldest of them, I shall put him last, for he seems to me to have understood the coming order of things far better than his more brilliant rivals. These Epigoni were in many respects nearer to Alexander in character and aims than any of the other and older Diadochi. They had that knight-errant quality in them which, in Alexander, fascinated continents and centuries of men. Cowardice is so universal in our race, and fear makes so large a part of the misery of life, that any man whose acts show him to be totally devoid of it will always be worshipped as a hero even if he displays this rare quality in the destruction of his fellows. In Alexander it was almost a craving to incur danger; if he was not charging at the head of his cavalry, he was occupied in hand-to-hand conflicts with wild beasts; these were the pleasures for which he underwent endless mental and bodily toil.

There is no doubt that PYRRHUS, the King of Epirus, more properly of the Molossians, had this temper, so that most of Alexander's veterans who met him saw in him the nearest approach to the great conqueror. He was essentially, too, a student of war. His only writing was on tactics. But as the younger Antigonos (Gonatas) used to say, he was a lucky player who did not know how to make use of his good throws. He won battles and lost campaigns; he won provinces and lost kingdoms; he gained the highest reputation of his age, and left nothing behind him—a brilliant meteor flashing across the stormy sky, and showing but a momentary track of its brilliant path. He is far the best known of the Diadochi to the modern student, for he passes into the domain of Roman history, and his campaigns and parleys with the great Republic have been made the occasion of glorifying Roman purity and morals.

But I will not spend time over his wars, which are related for schoolboys in their manuals, so far as they relate to Italy. The story of his life in Plutarch is more than usually picturesque. His escape as an infant from murderous pursuit, the delay at the swollen river, the difficulties of shouting across and the risk of the passage, then his infant appeal for mercy to his unwilling host—all this is so touching as to produce a narrative not equalled in Greek history since Herodotus's narrative of the escape of the infant Cypselus.¹ His Molossians appear to have had that unsteady character which appears all through the history of Epirus. Accustomed as they were to kings, they seem always ready to take up with a new ruler. Thus a temporary absence of Pyrrhus, when a youth of sixteen, lost him a second time his royal rights. But his exile was spent in great wars and at splendid courts, and this it was, more than his boasted heroic descent from Hellenic ancestors, which gave him the kingly manners and the culture which so impressed the Romans.

¹ Plut. Pyrrhus, 2, 3. Herod. v. 92, and my Social Life in Greece, p. 164.

He had been born after Alexander's death (about 318 B.C.), and therefore had only second-hand accounts of the great ideal of the age. But he lived in intimacy with Demetrius, the most striking man of the day; he took part in the great battle of the kings (Ipsus), and then went as a voluntary hostage for Demetrius to Egypt, where old Ptolemy was writing his memoirs of Alexander. So he learned to imitate the smaller points of the conqueror; he had prophetic dreams regularly before his battles; he charged with his cavalry, though all the while keeping his head and directing the movements; when he recovered his kingdom he kept diaries, like Alexander; he married many wives, all of them princesses; nay, at Alexandria when a youth he gained the favour of the reigning queen, who gave him, a homeless prince, her daughter Antigone in marriage. But he was no ladies' man, like Demetrius; he was too fierce-looking to be called beautiful, and his closely set teeth were so remarkable as to produce the legend that each row was a solid bone. He was also said to cure spleen (liver?) diseases, by sacrificing a cock for the patient, and chafing his liver with his right foot. In fact, his great toe had such divine virtue that, like Shelley's heart, it refused to burn on the funeral pyre.

The point of interest to us in his character is to see how completely this Molossian had adopted Hellenic, or rather Hellenistic, culture, and taken his place among that large society of kings who lived together in hostile peace and friendly war, always foes and never enemies, all connected by marriage and opposed by interest, a society more like that of the Norman barons in Southern Europe than anything which the world has seen before or since. His prime minister, the Thessalian Cineas, has been made famous by his missions to Rome—an orator, a Greek, a man 'who had heard Demosthenes,' and therefore, like a man who followed Alexander, far superior to his rivals. This love of looking back to great models is one of the most distinctive features in an age which, in politics and morals, had broken absolutely with the past. The authenticity of those politenesses between Cineas and the senate, of which Plutarch and the world have made such capital, cannot but be suspicious; how could the Romans of that day have understood Greek in any numbers? and Cineas of course knew no Latin. We hear of no interpreter, and yet through some such person, some Samnite or Apulian with a Greek mother, all the negotiations must have been carried on.

Nevertheless the general character of the war can hardly have been distorted. The Romans recognised in Pyrrhus a man civilised beyond the level of Italy, a brave captain, and an honourable foe. And he, a mere soldier of fortune, seeking conquest as a means to other conquests, and regarding nothing but his own glory, nevertheless had culture deep enough to carry on the struggle like a gentleman, and even to recognise the moral depth and weight of the Roman character. Here was indeed a philosophy better than the Stoic, for it was the philosophy of a nation, shown in actual life, and Pyrrhus, after his chequered career in the Two Sicilies, felt clearly that here lay the power which was the real danger to eastern Hellenism. He called to his allies and rivals to come to his aid, but in vain. When his expedition was first proposed, it had been their common interest to get this knight-errant out of their way, and so we have the spectacle, impossible at any other age, of three kings—Ptolemy Keraunus who had seized Macedon, his brother Philadelphus of Egypt, and Antiochus of Asia, who were at war one with the other, all contributing men, horse, elephants, and treasure, to get rid of this outsider, on whom no one could count. Now that he had found out and told them the real danger, they were too selfish or too busy to help him. Ptolemy Keraunus indeed was dead, killed by the Galatæ, and Antigonus Gonatas had recovered the kingdom of Macedon, a man of a new age and of new ideas. So Pyrrhus came home in disgust, set upon Antigonus, reconquered Macedonia, and then, after one more of the unsuccessful attempts on Sparta, went to die by the hand of an old woman in the streets of Argos (272 B.C.)¹ But though all his acts left no trace on the kingdoms of Hellenistic peoples, he had afforded one more specimen of the mock-Alexander type, whose life was war, and whose delight was in danger; whose court also spread abroad ideas of luxury and refinement, whose treatment even of his foes refined and softened the manners of the age, and whose palace at Ambracia showed the rude Epirotes how the bravery of the hardest mountaineer could be combined with the silken hangings and purple carpets of oriental monarchs. /

We have in DEMETRIUS the Besieger (Poliorketes) a very kindred and yet very dissimilar character. Born in 337,

¹ The manner of his death is unanimously reported by all our authorities. They differ as to whether he was at the wall or inside the town. Cf. Droysen's Hellenismus, iii. 217, 218, where the evidence is fully discussed.

he was nearly twenty years older than Pyrrhus, but he died only nine years before him, and we can hardly say that he had attained a trace of the soberness or leisure of age. His life is a perfect storm of youthful enjoyment and adventure. Brought up all his youth in the Phrygian court of Antigonos, which with all the old man's rudeness of manner was not wanting in splendour; educated as Alexander had been, to the topmost level of Hellenism; endowed with such beauty that no sculptor or painter was ever able adequately to reproduce it, Demetrius was, like all his rivals, bred and trained carefully in the art of war. He was an excellent general and admiral, most famous in his military engineering, from which he got his title. 'With his size of body and his beauty,' says Diodorus,¹ 'he showed such heroic dignity that strangers who came and saw comeliness adorned with the pre-eminence of a king, marvelled and followed him as he went abroad, for the very sight's sake. In mind too he was exalted and magnificent, looking down not merely upon the common people but upon those in authority. And, most remarkable of all, whereas in time of peace he spent his time in drinking and in banquets with dance and revel, seeking, in short, to emulate the reign of Dionysus, once fabled among men; in time of war he was active and abstemious, outrivalling his companions in toil alike of mind and body. In his time the mightiest weapons were forged, and machines of every kind were devised, far surpassing those which had been in use among other peoples.' But he did not, like Pyrrhus, make the warrior side of Alexander the ideal of his life. To him battles were not an end, but a means to that glory which would give him universal dominion over the minds of men and the hearts of women. This latter passion was, however, always crossing his better interests, and the variety of his amours was not so much a scandal as a wonder to the people of the time.

¹ xx. 92.

Here he fell far below his model, for Alexander's mind had always been occupied with greater things, and his body with such hard work that distractions of this kind laid no hold upon him. Still, if Pyrrhus sought to follow in the steps of Alexander by pure strategy, and became such a master that the theorists said he surpassed his teacher in that respect, Demetrius took a more imaginative view, and felt that it was not by arms but by his personality that Alexander had achieved his greatest successes. His strength and beauty were not inferior to Alexander's ; he took care that his culture should be not less ; his talents were undoubted ; but the spontaneity of genius was not there. However great a master of rhetoric Aristotle may have been, Alexander, to judge from his manifesto to Darius after the battle of Issus (Arrian, ii. 14), was no master of the Greek style even of that age. The document is curiously clumsy and badly composed. But we cannot say that Demetrius, even in his mature life, had learned to speak as he ought. In one of his last speeches to the Athenians (about 295 B.C.) we are told that he barbarised (ἐβαρβαρίσας), and that one of the Attic audience who was close by corrected him. Plutarch, led, no doubt, by the wording of his sources, constantly speaks of the theatrical (the tragic) style of his appearance and of his acts. He was always posing as a great man, and if he did not spend the evening boasting of his achievements, as Alexander was said to have done, men must have felt that he thought over them all the more.

Yet even he had not a few brilliant conquests to boast of. He had defeated the most successful of all the Diadochi, Ptolemy, both by sea and land ; princesses vied for his hand, and were even content with his passing favours ; artists and philosophers opened to him the wealth of their stores. So we can imagine that when his wily old father sent him to 'free Athens,' the youth landed in the Piræus with splendid hopes, and regarded himself as the coming leader in a really Hellenic empire, with real culture and refinement at its capital. We are not told how his illusions must have been dissipated by the indecent flatteries of the restored democracy. The formal decrees of Stratocles¹ voting him and his father kings, then gods, and crawling in the dust before him with their new liberty, must indeed have shown him that the days of this kind of polity were gone, and that Hellenism could not be reconstructed at Athens. We hear not a word of his visits to the philosophers' schools at Athens, or how far he may have been able to overcome the moral indignation of Zeno, of Epicurus, or of Xenocrates. For these men were even then the leaders of the best classes at Athens. But to this curious condition of Athens we shall return when our portraits of the princes are completed. It was no doubt with a feeling of disgust and contempt that he turned to ribald and sensual enjoyments, and gave way to a great debauch, in which he violated all the sanctities of the Acropolis, brought the foul Lamia to sup with Athene in the Parthenon, and lived like the most abandoned oriental despot in the city which he had restored to its liberty.

But from this time onward we see in Demetrius a cynical and selfish turn as regards the ruling over men. When he became King of Macedonia he was noted for a pompous and discourteous manner to his subjects. He had learned to treat ordinary mortals with contempt. The Athenians, who had once worshipped him as a god, would not admit him as an exile. Thus he came more and more to use masses of men as mere materials to further conquest, and not as intelligent and moral beings to be swayed by attachment. He became no less than Pyrrhus the world's scourge.

¹ Plut. Demetr. 10-12, to be cited presently.

And yet there was about him something bright which could not be corroded ; there was a vein of gold beneath the silver and the dross. His affection for his father was so strong and tender as to excite the wonder of the age and constant boasting of the old man ; not less remarkable is the devotion of his noble wife Phila, daughter of old Antipater, who stood by him in all his vagaries and vicissitudes, and poisoned herself when she thought his ruin inevitable. The same undying love is seen in her son Antigonus, afterwards the wise and enlightened ruler of Macedonia and Greece, who offered his liberty and even his life to recover his ruined and reckless father. Nor do his family stand alone in this feeling ; we hear that when he was captive many cities and despots petitioned Seleucus for his release, and against them Lysimachus stood alone, in his anxious entreaties and traitorous offers to have the great firebrand kept from again bringing the world into anxiety and disorder. These facts show how real a charm there must have been about the man, far beyond that engendered by chivalry and generosity in war, or even that somewhat affected veneration for art which comes out in the parley with the Rhodians during the great siege about the painting by Protogenes,¹ which, after seven years of the artist's labour, had been left unfinished in the suburbs. Demetrius assured them he would rather burn his father's statues than harm such a work.

To make the portraits of this age complete, we have still before us the figure of CASANDER of Macedon, the son of Antipater, the life-long opponent first of the royal family, then of Demetrius, of Pyrrhus, of Ptolemy when he attempted children at dinner up to mature five, because he had never killed his habits of the Macedonian country doubt made him despised by Alex the cause, he showed all through h terminated hostility to the Great Kin to be violent, his obstinacy remarka no evidence beyond his acts. He w as I conceive his father to have b all the wisdom of the Greeks. I favourite, and here only he imitate with him always a special copy, and poet by heart. The competence of l ing may be perhaps inferred from the pedantry of his brother Alexarchus, w Uranopolis, on the summit of Mount strange jargon on some peculiar pr Athenæus quotes a letter he wrote,¹ take the Theban Sphinx to interpre told how he got his head banged ag may be sure his haughty temper dete the insult in blood. Fortune gave opportunity.

¹ Plut. Demetr. 22.

both on his deathbed on no account to let the royal princesses, especially the furious queen-mother, seize the reins of power. We can imagine Casander promising faithfully to carry out these directions, adding silently the vow that it should apply no less to the princes.

Not brooking to be second, and escaping under the pretence of a great hunt into Thrace and to Asia, he joined Antigonus, and set himself to regain Greece and Macedon, where he had many adherents among the local governors, from the new regent and the royal family. He then adopted openly the policy from which he never swerved, that of independent sovereignties, as opposed to that of the royal house of Alexander. The complications of his after life, his constant wars in Greece, Macedonia, and Epirus, are among the most perplexing portions of this intricate history. In the face of all the other Diadochi, Antigonus, Demetrius, Ptolemy, and, first of all, Polysperchon, who kept proclaiming the liberty of the Greeks, he determined to rule them by oligarchs and by garrisons; and in this policy, inherited from Antipater, he in the main succeeded. In a special chapter on the state of Greece we shall again treat of this matter at length. The quarrels of the royal house introduced his long-conceived policy of its destruction. The bold and daring princess Eurydike, now married to the silly Philip Arridæus, called on him to return with her from Asia to Macedon and assert her husband's rights. Of course she was opposed by Olympias, who kept in her charge Roxane and the infant Alexander, and defended them with furious jealousy. In the war for the succession which ensued Olympias got the upper hand, and not only put to death her rivals at once, but committed such odious excesses in punishing their adherents that the Macedonians were disgusted, and went over to Casander. She was not saved by , imprisoned, and then in and cold-blooded murder planned carried out with such prudence as festation of sympathy with the children in the Tower had no sac born to the heritage of the world then in obscurity, then in confinement conclude a life of hopeless misery anecdote has survived to tell us of

The situation alone makes him a str

There remained only the bastard sperchon adopted to sustain his fall
But with his merciless logic Casan to destroy him. The wars and enmities all secondary to their interests. Th another well, and fought with the mos and friendliness. So the whole ho destroyed by the man whom he prob conditioned milksop, not worth using

This personal hostility showed i Casander, no less than in his reven of his adopting Asiatic features in seems to avoid any claim to rule in and yet by his superior consistency he held his ground even against Demetrius, who, with all his splendour and his liberation of the Greeks, was unable to oust Casander from his kingdom. He was no doubt in serious danger just before the battle of Ipsus, but the great events pending in Asia caused both combatants to agree in suspending the war in Europe, and in sending their forces to Asia. Casander, with all his various activity, had not the constitution of the hardy old race; he died of lingering disease at the age of fifty-seven, and his children seem to have inherited his bodily weaknesses with the worst side of his character. They were murdered either one by the other or by Demetrius, and so the monarchy of Casander disappeared, to be resuscitated after many momentous struggles by his sister's and Demetrius's son, Antigonus.

Casander's character is certainly one of the clearest, hardest, and most consistent among the Diadochi. What he lacked in genius he made up in determination. His record as murderer of the house of Alexander has left a dark stain upon his memory; but without palliating it, we may remark that there was not one of his rivals who would not have done the same thing, excepting Eumenes, for the reasons above stated. The son of Alexander must soon have dispossessed his regents, and there was not one of the satraps who had the smallest intention of resigning sovran power.

We have now completed our sketch of the various princes who ruled the Eastern world in the throes which gave birth to Hellenism. It is a period when there were so many wars and rumours of wars that the commander and the army occupy public attention, to the exclusion of civil life and domestic events. But the generals were like the great public temper is shown

 the assumption of the title king strange and disgusting to the Hel as belonging peculiarly to the Eastern barbarians. Yet now we anticipating the tide of public op vagance of their flattery, they hailed t and Demetrius, as kings. They car in this, and their unconscious expre age was probably loathed by the them. A year after (306 B.C.), all gonus, Ptolemy, Seleucus, formally a them Casander, as if he hesitated to whom he had murdered. For the di member of Alexander's house, Herak the last sentimental objection to such forth each of the Diadochi held his conquest (δορίκτητον), and no older mandated or asserted. The partition paradeisus was assumed to be the sta history.¹

¹ The opening verses of the First Maccab
 of Alexander and his successors by orient pass after that.

But I must return from history to social life, which is my direct object. My sketch of the princes and courts of the Diadochi would indeed be incomplete if I did not add something concerning the princesses who play so prominent a part in the great struggle. We are no longer among those women who may have held it excellence to be never mentioned among men for good or for evil, but among haughty peeresses, with royal rights and property of their own, who can make harangues, ride at the head of their troops, and make offers of marriage to men.

Philip had led the fashion of marrying many wives ; we hear of seven more or less regular marriages ; of his wives, the gloomy and violent Olympias was the chief, and plays a great figure in history. She would not brook any rival, and after Philip's death, which many supposed her to have contrived, she put to death with tortures the last wife, Cleopatra, and her infant son. From that time onward she lived all through her son's life, and for some years afterward, claiming a queenly power in Macedon, quarrelling bitterly with old Antipater, and putting to death, whenever she could, her rivals for power. She appears to have taken up with great loyalty Roxane, the legitimate wife of Alexander, and his infant son, and there is something tragic in her struggles to maintain their cause against the cold and cruel Casander. She retained to the last, as Alexander's mother, such an influence over the Macedonian soldiers that they would only slay her after a mock trial, and though she had murdered nations and tyrants, and they paid him tribute. And after these things he fell upon his couch, and knew that he was dying. And he called his pages (παῖδες) of renown that were brought up with him from youth, and divided unto them his kingdom while he was yet alive. And his pages prevailed each in his own place. And they all put crowns upon them after he was dead, and their sons after them for many years, and evils were multiplied in the earth.'

Casander. The latter then sent her a ship, and had a ship ready, that she might escape. But she replied that she would never go before all the Macedonians. The risk, on account of the great posthumous estimation; and when he sent 2000 men to come out to meet them in royal array, and her ladies. Whereupon they were all killed. Then Casander again appealed to the people, who killed her with stones. She tore out her hair, and arranging her robes decently.

So then, in spite of her furious and bloodthirsty acts, this woman was still loved, but had attained to 'that divinity which is in a king.' We hear nothing of her children, but was given to Orphic and Bacchic dances, she wearied Alexander with constant letters, which were regarded as her own. This is from an anecdote told by Plutarch, that when at war with her husband Philip, Cassandra would read all the other despatches, and the letter from Olympias, which she had sealed just as it was. This is the story.

princes in Germany used French, employing a very trustworthy private secretary, who carried on for her those many secret and open correspondences, which she held with her son, and afterwards with Perdikkas, Eumenes, Polysperchon, and with cities such as Athens.

Philip had three daughters: Cleopatra, by Olympias, and therefore full sister to the great Alexander; Kynane, by an Illyrian princess; and Thessalonike, married to Casander, who gave her name to the town he built which became famous in history, and which still survives (Thessalonica). She was murdered by one of his sons. But though her name has not perished we know nothing of her character, nor does she play the prominent part of her half-sisters. Of these, Cleopatra married her uncle, the Epirote (Molossian) Alexander, Olympias's brother, who, while his greater namesake was conquering the East, essayed to subdue the West; and went by invitation of the cities of Magna Græcia to defend them against the mountaineers of the Abruzzi, who were gradually destroying the Hellenic power in Italy. But his ambition reached too far for the Italiot Greeks; he was murdered and his army scattered (about 331 B.C.)

So the young widow was left a princess, like her aunt Olympias, both of Epirus and of Macedonia. Though they not unfrequently quarrelled, their interests were generally at one, and the young queen, as soon as Alexander, her brother, was also dead, sought to make good her pretensions to the kingdom. She was the most legitimate of all the pretenders, so long as the infant son of Queen Roxane was not grown up; and her claims were so well recognised, that she had the choice of all the husbands in the world. She secretly chose the gallant Leonnatus, probably from personal liking; and he came at once at her proposal, but was killed in helping less have married her. She resided in royal state, and when accused of old Antipater, who was returning regent, defended herself with such Macedonians that the general thought alone. At last she found herself in at Sardis, and when over fifty proposed to marry Ptolemy, who had already children. She was murdered by that even then, in the zenith of power, feared the influence which a royal exiled queen would give to his rival.

She has the same bold independence and was certainly educated as the secluded like a Greek girl. Still, she spoke Greek perfectly, she defence to the soldiers at Sardis was probably the secret of the independence queens had in their day. After hearing at the courts of the satraps, it must be a whiff of their mountain air to hear in their native tongue; for even Alexander intimes would address them.

alliance. She bartered her royal name and perhaps large possessions for the armies and the ambition of a Macedonian satrap-general. Most of Alexander's staff were sprung from noble houses, and though subjects now, had once been independent princes.¹ She would, doubtless, have regarded a marriage with Eumenes a grave mésalliance, only to be excused by urgent state reasons; but to invite Leonnatus or Ptolemy to be her husband was as natural to her as for these princes to enter into an alliance for the furtherance of their power.

But as Olympias or Cleopatra might have been oriental princesses; so Roxane could murder her rivals and their children just like the Macedonian Olympias. When we come to Kynane, the daughter of Philip by an Illyrian mother, and her daughter Eurydike, married by the wish of the Macedonians to Philip Arridæus, we find quite a different type. This princess went to war on horseback, and charged the enemy like her cousin, the King of Macedonia. He had put to death her husband Amyntas, and she was a widow; but she preferred war to married life, and is even said to have killed another Illyrian princess or queen in the shock of battle. One wonders that the historians of Alexander went to the wild regions about the Caspian for their Amazons to glorify the conqueror. On Alexander's death she determined to take part in the division of the world; she set out with an armed escort and her daughter Eurydike, whom she desired to marry to Philip Arridæus; she burst through the troops Antipater sent to stop her, proposed was insisted on by the queen Eurydike from henceforth the bloody politics of the house have been queen in Macedonia but Olympias to Macedonian respect. would not fight against her and Kyser inserted her when she led them against It was the moment when Olympias' after many years. Amid her orgies entombing her enemies, she was offspring of Philip's faithlessness, for the son of a Thessalian dancing girl Illyrian savage. She shut them up and by gradual starvation. But her people and then having Philip shot by Thracians the sword, the halter, and the hemlock 'But she, praying that Olympias might composed the limbs of her husband, as best she could, and then without regard at her fate or the greatness of her misdeed self with her girdle.' If these women they knew how to die.¹

¹ This marks the great difference between Napoleon's generals and the generals of Alexander. Both Napoleon and his generals were upstarts, whereas Alexander was a hereditary king, and almost all his generals hereditary princes, like many generals in the present German army. This, too, helps to explain how the Frenchmen failed as independent sovrans, while the Macedonians succeeded.

And as all the Diadochi --

forming a brilliant and lively society, whose ways and manners must have had a powerful influence on the life of all classes of their subjects. How little sanctity the bond of marriage had in their eyes is shown not only by the anecdotes already related, but especially by the indignant astonishment of Seleucus that his son Antiochus should be allowed to pine away for love of a married woman. The wily physician indeed pretended it was his own wife, but when he had safely ascertained the king's mind, he told him that Antiochus was dying for love of his step-mother, the new queen, sister to King Demetrius. Then the king does not hesitate to resign her to his son. It seems also that the old titular-regent, Polysperchon, married his son's widow, Kratesipolis, an excellent woman, and beloved on account of her kindness to the poor.¹ When her husband died, who was at the time lord of Sicyon, and the citizens revolted from her, despising her as a woman, she met them, herself commanding, in fair battle, defeated them, and crucified thirty. Thus established as tyrant of Sicyon, this noble and excellent person signified to the handsome Demetrius that she was open to his advances, but the assignation was rudely interrupted, and Demetrius had to fly for his life.²

Perhaps the woman who bears the highest character of all the gallery of queens in that day was Phila, the daughter of Antipater, married to Craterus, and after his death to Demetrius. To this handsome wayward husband she was so attached that all his inconstancies, his new marriages, his disgraces, could not alter her affection. She bore him a noble and devoted son, Antigonus, and was thus the mother of the famous line of Macedonian kings. She helped her husband always, even in his long absences, with her influence. We may conceive her attaining the world; when his people rebelled, and Lysimachus, and Ptolemy ousted him more into exile, the noble-hearted fate no longer, and took poison to end of her life.

¹ Diod. xix. 67.

² Cf. below, p. 84.

We have no picture of her character, and the son she brought up, speaks exception to her class. Nevertheless herself to a husband more shameless infidelities. The Egyptian princesses connection with their kingdom, one of Arsinoe, married Keraunus, the murderer Agathocles, of Seleucus, and of her princess indeed is an epitome of the age more than enough, has been said on the feature of the times. Let us now turn to people and more natural life, and seen by these brilliant and refined immoral courts.

CHAPTER V

HOME POLITICS DURING THE WARS OF THE DIADOCHI

IT is a great misfortune entailed upon us by war, that it not only tends to destroy all the quiet phases of culture—home life, domestic virtues, country pursuits, but it so absorbs the interest of spectators and historians that whatever social life it does not actually destroy becomes obscure and falls into oblivion. Thus Thucydides fills his great work with the details of petty campaigns, and will not tell us a word of the life of men, of the matchless art of his time, even of the political condition of the Greece in his day. The bravery of Brasidas seems to him far more worthy of narration than the cunning of Phidias ; the sea battles of Phormio than the adventurous trading among the tribes of Gaul or the Crimea ; and most unfortunately his example is followed by most of his fellow historians. Diodorus's history, our only remaining consecutive account of this period, is almost altogether devoted to campaigns and battles, and thus when Plutarch came to write his inestimable Lives other material was much lacking.

There were, indeed, in the generations immediately succeeding that of Alexander, historians who felt the dryness of such narrative, and sought to relieve it by anecdotes. These pose, however, provided the history which they described, anecdotes, will express what was thought at the time, and may therefore fairly be taken as a picture of the life of the age. So also the hostility displayed against the poets, and the partiality to others, though it may even the picture we form of some of the poets, at least give us a notion of what was thought of them by ordinary society. But not only is the life of the poets only reported, with the rarest exceptions, by the philosophers. There was indeed a great deal of witty sayings of courtesans! but the life of the people we hear very little indeed. The life of the poets have into their life is to be got from the fragments in the collected Greek fragments, or from Plautus. Here too we are led to see that the mise en scène is mere exhibitions of style and of facile sayings, and that what use is there in quarrelling with the poets, who are indeed very poor and bad, yet make the worst, but the best of their kind.

Let us begin with Athens, which was the most important portance and in which the

in Attic society ; a third in the social habits of the stage, as seen in the genteel comedy of the day. These three societies are so strongly contrasted that it is very difficult to harmonise them, or to understand their co-existence in a small capital like Athens. But let us first produce our facts.

The reader must remember that at Athens, and probably throughout Greece, the conflict was no longer between aristocrats and democrats, but between the rich and the poor. At Athens certainly, the Revolution of 411 and the Restoration of 403 B.C. had settled that question. From thence onward it is a question how much the rich shall contribute, not whether the noble families shall maintain their influence. I believe the most analogous condition to be found in our day is in Geneva, where the completed democracy looks upon its richer members as intended to bear all the burdens of the state.

At Athens this was particularly the case in war times, when the mob voted the estimates and the rich had to supply them. Thus the only chance of avoiding ruinous war expenses was to keep the populace in good humour by those amusements which might be curtailed by war. For the question of expense is really the main obstacle to a nation carrying its sentimental outbursts of indignation into effect. We must therefore expect to find all through this period the rich on the side of peace, those in fact who had something to lose advocating the policy of keeping quiet ; while the populace, who loved hearing speeches and passing resolutions, were ready for any excitement, and would rush into wars which could do them no harm, but might, with the banishment of the peace party, bring unexpected gains into their hands.

Thus Diodorus tells us :—

As for the Athenian people, the men of substance counselled people should take thought for Greece, set free the cities now being forty triremes and two hundred qua under forty years of age were to be being told off to guard Attica, while themselves in readiness for foreign was proposed to send out ambassadors of Greece and proclaim that, a people, holding all Hellas to be the Hellenes, had repelled by sea the impose the yoke of slavery, so now they bound to risk their lives, their money common safety of the Greeks. This only too easily. The shrewder Greek people had certainly been well advised concerned, but had failed in point of power had acted too soon, had run the series unbeaten and powerful forces, and for all had not taken warning by the fate of the less the ambassadors went the round of mended war with their accustomed plaus as leagues or as individual cities, the great the alliance.¹

The only remedy the rich could support of a foreign power, such as sent a garrison with a military com-

Under these circumstances a vast number went into voluntary exile, others were driven out. If they went to Asia, and entered as mercenaries into the service of the Macedonian satraps, they generally made money, and lived in luxury; but that did not console them for their exile, even when voluntary; and like the Irish now prospering in America, who nourish feelings of bitter hate against the English rule, to which they ascribe their emigration, these exiles were always looking forward to the day of their return to their country in power, to declare its autonomy. There is, at any rate, this remarkable point of likeness, that while many must have profited immensely by being sent out of the old country, no amount of material gains destroyed their strong sentiment as regards the liberty of their home city, and their hatred to those who, even in those cases where they had really turned them out, had been the occasion of their improved fortune.

On the other hand, while the sentimental objections to a foreign garrison were insuperable, and while no doubt foreign soldiery and their leaders were often a serious obstacle to the moral and family life of the remaining citizens, we know that in many cases the better classes, including the philosophers, lived on good terms with moderate and humane military governors, and that if political excitement was wanting, social and material wellbeing were amply secured.

We should expect to hear of the return of exiles of both classes, the rich or philo-Macedonian and the poor or Home Rule party. And we should have expected to find scenes of blood similar to those which disgraced the history of Greece in Thucydides's day, and which he falsely says were then unheard of and new. Yet all the restorations which come before us at this epoch seem to be those of exiled

Antipater. Alexander seems to have had a quibble when he declared to them at Olympia: 'King Alexander to the cities.'¹ We have not been the cause of your return to us, excepting those exiled under a curse; to Antipater to force the cities to restore you.' This order, while it confirmed the treaty of Corinth, whereby the Greeks were to be gradually and internally autonomous, was quite foreign to Alexander's policy in Greece.² Possibly it was the attempt of all the parties in Greece, including Antipater, to bring Alexander to a king intended to follow up his policy. Like most acts of Alexander, it led to his death. On the part of the successors to his throne, the determined opposition of Cassander, who set himself against the acts of Alexander.

No sooner had Antipater subdued the assembled Greeks to shake off his yoke—it cost him a close beleaguering battle and a very hard fought victory—than he broke the Greek alliance, ill advisedly.

where by the means he adopted at Athens. He demanded the surrender of the leading firebrands of liberty, such as Demosthenes and Hypereides; he abolished manhood suffrage, and introduced a property qualification; he put a garrison in Munychia. We cannot tell how far he succeeded in deporting the disfranchised poor, but the numbers and figures given by Diodorus (xviii. 18) are very important in affording a view of the then wealth and population of Athens. When they surrendered unconditionally 'he treated them,' says the historian, 'with consideration, and allowed them to keep their city and possessions; he changed their polity from a democracy into a property franchise, and gave those possessed of more than 2000 drachmæ (about £75 of our money) the control of the state and votes, but all those below this figure, as being turbulent and warlike, he expelled from political rights, and to those of them that chose he gave settlements in Thrace.¹ These, being more than 12,000, were removed from their country; the remainder who were qualified, being about 9000, were declared owners of the city and territory, and lived according to the laws of Solon.' He put Menyllus as military governor into the fort of Munychia to keep them from revolution. 'The Athenians then being unexpectedly well treated obtained peace, and afterwards, being free from political disturbance, and in safe enjoyment of their country, they quickly ran up in the scale in wealth.'

This general settlement, of which Athens gives us the type, was received throughout Greece with laudations, and the voting of crowns to Antipater. It was confirmed by

¹ Exiles from Greece seem to have been defined by removing beyond the Acroceraunian Mountains and Cape Tænarus (Plut. Phoc. 29). The eastern limits are not stated. Phocion persuaded Antipater to allow some to settle in the Peloponnesus.

Casander, who, when they sent him Demades to request the withdrawal of the garrison, put that person to death on the well-founded charge of secret machinations in Asia, and so made practically a final settlement. It reduced largely the number of citizens, and restored wealth and peace to the city, but imposed insignificance upon it for ever.

Let us briefly trace its history during the period before us. The settlement of Antipater was in 324 B.C. He and Casander managed Athens by means of the worthy Phocion and the villainous Demades. Peace and prosperity were restored till 319 B.C., when the new regent, Polysperchon, wishing to checkmate Casander's influence, issued the first of these ridiculous proclamations, declaring all the Greeks free and independent. From Polysperchon to Flamininus, nay to Nero, these proclamations were made at intervals, and on every occasion were received with acclamations by the great public of Greece. I should rather have said by the mob, for from Phocion to Polybius the wiser and calmer people knew that all this was illusion, that petty cities and cantons cannot exercise imperial rights beside great empires, and that without political importance political rights are a mere farce.

The rescript of Polysperchon, composed in the name of his silly ward, King Philip Arridæus, is a curious document, but too long to quote here.¹ It proposes to restore to the Greeks, not absolute liberty, but the constitutions sanctioned by Philip II. and his son Alexander (a clear proof that the dependence on Macedonia was accepted on all sides), and to abolish the wise arrangements of Antipater. It was no peace measure, but a war measure directed against his rival Casander. The old general even advised at Argos certain executions and banishments in order to strengthen his party.¹ Then were re-enacted the former scenes of violence, and the growing peace of Hellas was rudely checked. The exiles, as usual, came back full of bloodthirsty fury, and wreaked their vengeance on those of their fellow-citizens who had monopolised civic privileges—all the more gladly as they were everywhere the holders of property. By a fortunate accident, the circumstances of the moment at Athens are preserved to us in Plutarch's Life of Phocion.² The fort of Munychia was still held by an officer of Casander, Nicanor, whom he had sent to replace Menyllus at the moment of the crisis of his father's death. This commander, like Menyllus, was a worthy man, and well disposed to keep the city in peace and order. But his presence was not only a galling obstacle to the democrats; it was a thorn in the side of Polysperchon, whose object in 'freeing Athens' was merely to substitute a garrison of his own in this all-important military position. The facts remind us of the frequent remark of Polybius, that man, apparently the wisest, is really the silliest of all animals, for though he is always being deceived by the same snares and devices, they still have their effect, and delude men as perfectly as if they had never been used before. Within a year the Athenians were so disgusted at their deliverer and the mob of exiles he had let loose upon them, that overtures were made to Casander, and he recovered his hold upon Athens under a compact, by which the franchise of Antipater (2000 drachmas) was lowered to 1000, and the Athenians were to nominate a governor whom he should approve. It was thus that the philosopher, Demetrius of Phaleron, was appointed regent at Athens, which he controlled for ten years of fresh peace and national prosperity.

¹ Diod. xviii. 56.

This rodомontade of 'freeing the Greeks' was again

¹ Diod. xviii. 69.

² Cf. also Diod. xviii. 65 sq.

them to exhibit to the world freedom.

Let us hear Plutarch's account recovered liberty (in 319 B.C.), Polysperchon's son, allowed to discussion.

Meantime Polysperchon, to whom person was committed, in order wrote letters to the Athenians restored them their ancient form to which, all the people had a right.
This was a snare he laid for Phocion.
making himself master of Athens actions), he was sensible that he while Phocion was in the way. He would be no difficult task, when from a share in the administrative orators and public informers were tribunals.

As these letters raised great commotion, Nicanor was desired to speak to Piræus; and for that purpose entered his person with Phocion. Dercyllus, king in the adjacent country, laid Nicanor getting timely information against it, and soon showed it.

For the truth is, he had such confidence in Nicanor, that when he had accounts brought him from several hands of his design upon the Piræus, of his ordering a body of mercenaries to Salamis, and of his bribing some of the inhabitants of the Piræus, he would give no credit to any of those things. Nay, when Philomedes got an edict passed, that all the Athenians should take up arms, and obey the orders of Phocion, the latter took no care to act in pursuance of it, till Nicanor had brought his troops out of Munychia, and carried his trenches round the Piræus. Then Phocion would have led the Athenians against him ; but by this time, they were become mutinous, and looked upon their commander with contempt.

At this juncture arrived Alexander, the son of Polysperchon, with an army, under pretence of assisting the city against Nicanor ; but, in reality, to avail himself of its fatal divisions, and to seize it, if possible, for himself. For the exiles who entered the town with him, the foreigners, and such citizens as had been degraded as infamous, with other mean people, resorted to him, and altogether made up a strange disorderly assembly, by whose suffrages the command was taken from Phocion, and other generals appointed. Had not Alexander been seen alone near the walls in conference with Nicanor, and by repeated interviews given the Athenians cause of suspicion, the city could not have escaped the danger it was in. Immediately the orator Agnonides singled out Phocion, and accused him of treason. Phocion, with such of his friends as did not forsake him, repaired to Polysperchon. Solon of Plataea, and Dinarchus of Corinth, who passed for the friends and confidants of Polysperchon, out of regard to Phocion, desired to be of the party. But Dinarchus falling ill by the way, they were obliged to stop many days at Elatea. In the meantime, Arcestratus proposed a decree, and Agnonides got it passed, that deputies should be sent to Polysperchon, with an accusation against Phocion.

The two parties came up to Polysperchon at the same time, as he was upon his march with the king, near Pharuges, a town of Phocis. There Polysperchon placed the king under a golden canopy, and his friends on each side of him ; and, before he proceeded to any other business, gave orders that Dinarchus should be put to the torture, and afterwards despatched. This done, he gave the Athenians audience. But, as they filled curiosity, were desirous of hearing made signs to the deputies to argue ever it was far from being conducted speech often interrupted Phocion that he struck his staff upon the more. Hegemon said, Polysperchus witness to his affectionate regard general answered, 'Do you come the king?' Upon this the king started run Hegemon through with his spear vented him; and the council broke.

The guards then surrounded Phocion a few, who, being at some distance and fled. Clitus carried the prisoners of having them tried there, but, in put to death, as persons already convicted.
conducting the thing made it a more prisoners were carried in carts through theatre, where Clitus shut them up assembled the people. From this assembly foreigners, nor persons disfranchised the tribunal and the theatre were opened.
letter was read; the purport of which the prisoners guilty of treason; but Athenians, as freemen, who were to be tried by the laws, to pass sentence upon them.'

At the same time Clitus presented The best of the citizens, when the assembly was called.

After which, no one attempted to offer anything in behalf of Phocion. It was with much difficulty that he obtained permission to speak. At last, silence being made, he said, 'Do you design to take away my life justly or unjustly?' Some of them answering, 'Justly;' he said, 'How can you know whether it will be justly, if you do not hear me first?' As he did not find them inclined in the least to hear him, he advanced some paces forward, and said, 'Citizens of Athens, I acknowledge I have done you injustice; and for my faults in the administration, adjudge myself guilty of death; but why will you put these men to death, who have never injured you?' The populace made answer, 'Because they are your friends.' Upon which he drew back, and resigned himself quietly to his fate.

Agnonides then read the decree he had prepared; according to which, the people were to declare by their suffrages whether the prisoners appeared to be guilty or not; and if they appeared so, they were to suffer death. When the decree was read, some called for an additional clause for putting Phocion to the torture before execution; and insisted, that the rack and its managers should be sent for immediately. But Agnonides, observing that Clitus was displeased at that proposal, and looking upon it himself as a barbarous and detestable thing, said, 'When we take that villain Callimedon, let us put him to the torture; but, indeed, my fellow-citizens, I cannot consent that Phocion should have such hard measure.' Upon this, one of the better disposed Athenians cried out, 'Thou art certainly right; for if we torture Phocion, what must we do to thee?' There was, however, hardly one negative when the sentence of death was proposed: all the people gave their voices standing; and some of them even crowned themselves with flowers, as if it had been a matter of festivity.¹

Such being the way in which the restored democracy treated their noblest and most respected enemies, let us see how they behaved to their friends. Here again we have a striking picture from Plutarch. In 308 B.C., as I have said, Antigonos, desiring to give greater effect to his bid for Hellenic support, and perhaps giving way to the solicitations of his generous and enthusiastic son, who may have had some chimera of a constitutional sovereignty over cultivated and artistic Greeks in his youthful imagination, sent him to take and free Athens in person. This brilliant and handsome, but somewhat pompous and swaggering young prince, effected his conquest with great skill. Being a prince, and accustomed to behave with courtesy and chivalry to his foes, he would not tolerate the horrors we have just seen under the liberation of Polysperchon. But he caused perhaps greater scandals of his own.

¹ Plut. Phoc. xxxiii to the end (Langhorne's Trans.)

Upon this proclamation [of liberty], the people threw down their arms, and receiving the proposal with loud acclamations, desired Demetrius to land, and called him their benefactor and deliverer. Demetrius the Phalerean, and his partizans, thought it necessary to receive a man who came with such a superior force, though he should perform none of his promises, and accordingly sent deputies to make their submission. Demetrius received them in an obliging manner, and sent back with them Aristodemus the Milesian, a friend of his father's. At the same time, he was not unmindful of Demetrius the Phalerean, who, in this revolution, was more afraid of the citizens than of the enemy; but out of regard to his character and virtue, sent him with a strong convoy to Thebes, agreeably to his request. He likewise assured the Athenians, that however desirous he might be to see their city, he would deny himself that pleasure till he had set it entirely free, by expelling the garrison. He therefore surrounded the fortress of Munychia with a ditch and rampart, to cut off its communication with the rest of the city, and then sailed to Megara, where Casander had another garrison.

On his arrival, he was informed, that Kratesipolis, the wife of Alexander the son of Polysperchon, a celebrated beauty, was at Patræ, and had a desire to see him. In consequence of which he left his forces in the territory of Megara, and with a few light horse took the road to Patræ. When he was near the place, he drew off from his men, and pitched his tent apart, that Kratesipolis might not be perceived when she came to pay her visit. But a party of the enemy getting intelligence of this, fell suddenly upon him. In his alarm, he had only time to throw over him a mean cloak ; and, in that disguise, saved himself by flight. So near an infamous captivity had his intemperate love of beauty brought him. As for his tent, the enemy took it, with all the riches it contained.

After Megara was taken, the soldiers prepared to plunder it ; but the Athenians interceded strongly for that people, and prevailed. Demetrius was satisfied with expelling the garrison, and declared the city free. Amidst these transactions, he bethought himself of Stilpo, a philosopher of great reputation, who sought only the retirement and tranquillity of a studious life. He sent for him, and asked him ‘Whether they had taken anything from him?’ ‘No,’ said Stilpo, ‘I found none that wanted to steal any knowledge.’ The soldiers, however, had clandestinely carried off almost all the slaves. Therefore, when Demetrius paid his respects to him again, on leaving the place, he said, ‘Stilpo, I leave you entirely free.’ ‘True,’ answered Stilpo, ‘for you have not left a slave among us.’

Demetrius then returned to the siege of Munychia, dislodged the garrison, and demolished the fortress. After which the Athenians pressed him to enter the city, and he complied. Having assembled the people, he re-established the commonwealth in its ancient form ; and, moreover, promised them, in the name of his father, a hundred and fifty thousand measures of wheat, and timber enough to build a hundred galleys. Thus they recovered the democracy fifteen years after it was dissolved. During the interval, after the Lamian war, and the battle of Cranon, the government was called an oligarchy, but was monarchical in fact ; for the power of Demetrius the Phalerean met with no control.

Their deliverer appeared glorious in his services to Athens ; but they rendered him obnoxious by the extravagant honours they decreed him. For they were the first who gave him and his father Antigonus the title of kings, which they had hitherto religiously avoided ; and which was, indeed, the only thing left to the descendants of Philip and Alexander, uninvaded by their generals. In the next place, they alone honoured them with the appellation of the gods protectors ; and, instead of denominating the year as formerly, from the archon, they abolished his office, created annually in his room a priest of those gods protectors, and prefixed his name to all their public acts.

They likewise ordered that their portraits should be wrought in the holy veil with those of the other gods. They consecrated the place where their patron first alighted from his chariot, and erected an altar there to DEMETRIUS THE DESCENDER. They added two to the number of their tribes, and called them Demetrias and Antigonis; in consequence of which the senate, which before consisted of five hundred members, was to consist of six hundred; for each tribe supplied fifty.

Stratocles, of whose invention these ingenious compliments were, thought of a stroke still higher. He procured a decree, that those who should be sent upon public business from the commonwealth of Athens to Antigonus and Demetrius, should not be called ambassadors, but Theori, a title which had been appropriated to those who, on the solemn festivals, carried the customary sacrifices to Delphi and Olympia, in the name of the Hellenic states. This Stratocles was, in all respects, a person of the most daring effrontery and the most debauched life, insomuch that he seemed to imitate the ancient Cleon in his scurrilous and licentious behaviour to the people.

When the Athenians were defeated in the sea-fight near Amorgos, he arrived at Athens before any account of the misfortune had been received, and passing through the Cerameicus with a chaplet on his head, told the people that they were victorious. He then moved that sacrifices of thanksgiving should be offered, and meat distributed among the tribes for a public entertainment. Two days after, the poor remains of the fleet were brought home; and the people, in great anger, calling him to answer for the deceit, he made his appearance in the height of the tumult, with the most consummate assurance, and said, 'What harm have I done you, in making you merry for two days?' Such was the impudence of Stratocles.

But there were other extravagances hotter than fire itself, as Aristophanes expresses it. One flatterer outdid even Stratocles in servility, by procuring a decree that Demetrius, whenever he visited Athens, should be received with the same honours that were paid to Demeter and Bacchus; and that whoever exceeded the rest in the splendour and magnificence of the reception he gave that prince, should have money out of the treasury, to enable him to set up some pious memorial of his success. These instances of adulation concluded with their changing the name of the month Munychion to Demettrion, with calling the last day of every month Demetrias; and the Dionysia; or feasts of Bacchus, Demetria.

The gods soon showed how much they were offended at these things. For the veil in which were wrought the figures of Demetrius and Antigonus, along with those of Zeus and Athene, as they carried it through the Cerameicus, was rent asunder by a sudden storm of wind. Hemlock grew up in great quantities round the altars of those princes, though it is a plant seldom found in that country. On the day when the Dionysia were to be celebrated, they were forced to put a stop to the procession by the excessive cold, which came entirely out of season; and there fell so strong a hoar frost, that it blasted not only the vines and fig-trees, but great part of the corn on the blade. Hence, Philippides, who was an enemy to Stratocles, thus attacked him in one of his comedies:—‘Who was the wicked cause of our vines being blasted by the frost, and of the sacred veil’s being rent asunder? He who transferred the honours of the gods to men: it is he, not comedy, that is the ruin of the people.’

What exceeded all the rage of flattery we have mentioned was the decree proposed by Dromocleides the Sphettian; according to which they were to consult the oracle of Demetrius, as to the manner in which they were to dedicate certain shields at Delphi. It was conceived in these terms: ‘In a fortunate hour, be it decreed by the people, that a citizen of Athens be appointed to go to the god protector, and, after due sacrifices offered, demand of Demetrius, the god protector, what will be the most pious, the most honourable and expeditious method of consecrating the intended offerings. And it is hereby enacted, that the people of Athens will follow the method dictated by his oracle.’ By this mockery of incense to his vanity, who was scarcely in his senses before, they rendered him perfectly insane.¹

The Athenians, though they had lavished honours upon him in the most extravagant manner, yet contrived on this occasion to appear new in their flattery. They gave orders that he should lodge in the back part of the Parthenon; which accordingly he did, and Minerva was said to have received him as her guest; a guest not very fit to come under her roof, or suitable to her virgin purity.

¹ Plut. Demetr. ix.-xiii.

And Demetrius, who ought to have revered Minerva, if on no other account yet as his eldest sister (for so he affected to call her), behaved in such a manner to persons of both sexes who were above the condition of slaves, and the citadel was so polluted with his baucheries, that it appeared to be kept sacred in some degree, when he indulged himself only with such prostitutes as Chrysis, Lamia, Demo, and Anticyra.

Some things we choose to pass over out of regard to the character of the city of Athens: but the virtue and chastity of Democles ought not to be left under the veil of silence. Democles was very young; and his beauty was no secret to Demetrius. Indeed, his surname unhappily declared it, for he was called Democles the Handsome. Demetrius, through his emissaries, left nothing unattempted to gain him by great offers, or to intimidate him by threats; but neither could prevail. He left the wrestling ring and all public exercises, and made use only of a private bath. Demetrius watched his opportunity, and surprised him there alone. The boy seeing nobody near to assist him, and the impossibility of resisting with any effect, took off the cover of the caldron, and jumped into the boiling water. It is true, he came to an unworthy end, but his sentiments were worthy of his country and of his personal merit.

Very different were those of Cleænetus the son of Cleomedon. That youth having procured his father the remission of a fine of fifty talents, brought letters from Demetrius to the people, signifying his pleasure in that respect. By which he not only dishonoured himself, but brought great trouble upon the city. The people took off the fine, but at the same time they made a decree, that no citizen should for the future bring any letter from Demetrius. Yet when they found that Demetrius was disobliged at it, and expressed his resentment in strong terms, they not only repealed the act, but punished the persons who proposed and supported it, some with death, and some with banishment. They likewise passed a new edict, importing; 'That the people of Athens had resolved, that whatsoever thing Demetrius might command, should be accounted holy in respect of the gods, and just in respect of men.' Some person of better principle on this occasion happening to say, that Stratocles was mad in proposing such decrees, Demochares answered: 'He would be mad, if he were not mad.' Stratocles found his advantage in his servility; and for this saying De-mochares was prosecuted and banished the city. To such meannesses were the Athenians brought, when the garrison seemed to be removed out of their city, and they pretended to be a free people !¹

There was indeed a party at Athens who were disgusted at these things, and if there was a competition of poets to celebrate the Saviour and Descender, and if there were shrines consecrated to his minions and his courtesans, there were philosophers who stood aloof, politicians who scowled, and poets who even dared to speak out—I suppose when the descender was not actually present to come down upon them. The extant ithyphallus, however, is too important not to be cited in full.

ὥς οἱ μέγιστοι τῶν θεῶν καὶ φίλτατοι τῇ πόλει πάρειςιν.
ἐνταῦθα [γὰρ Δήμητρα καὶ] Δημήτριον ἄμα παρήγ' ὁ καιρός.
χῆ μὲν τὰ σεμνὰ τῆς Κόρης μυστήρια
ἔρχεθ' ἵνα ποιήσῃ,
ὃ δ' ἱλαρός, ὥσπερ τὸν θεὸν δεῖ, καὶ καλὸς
καὶ γελῶν πάρεστι.
σεμνὸν ὅδε φαίνειθ', οἱ φίλοι πάντες κύκλῳ,
ἐν μέσοισι δ' αὐτός,
ὅμοιος ὥσπερ οἱ φίλοι μὲν ἀστέρες,
ἥλιος δ' ἐκείνος.
ὦ τοῦ κρατίστου παῖ Ποσειδῶνος θεοῦ χαῖρε κάφροδίτης.
ἄλλοι μὲν ἢ μακρὰν γὰρ ἀπέχουσιν θεοί,
ἢ οὐκ ἔχουσιν ὦτα,
ἢ οὐκ εἰσὶν, ἢ οὐ προσέχουσιν ἡμῖν οὐδὲ ἔν.
σὲ δὲ παρόνθ' ὀρώμεν,
οὐ ξύλινον οὐδὲ λίθινον ἀλλ' ἀληθινόν.
εὐχόμεσθα δὴ σοι
πρῶτον μὲν εἰρήνην ποίησον φίλτατε· κύριος γὰρ εἶ σὺ.

¹ Plut. Demetr. xxiii. xxiv.

τὴν δ' οὐχὶ Θηβῶν, ἀλλ' ὅλης τῆς Ἑλλάδος σφίγγα περικρατοῦσαν, Αἰτωλόν, ὅστις ἐπὶ πέτρας καθήμενος
 ὥσπερ ἡ παλαιά
 τὰ σώμαθ' ἡμῶν πάντ' ἀναρπάσας φέρει, κούκ ἔχω μάχεσθαι, (αἰτωλικὸν γὰρ ἀρπάσαι τὰ τῶν πέλας, νῦν δὲ καὶ τὰ πόρρω)
 μάλιστα μὲν δὴ κόλασον αὐτός· εἰ δὲ μή, Οἰδίπουν τιν' εὐρέ,
 τὴν σφίγγα ταύτην ὅστις ἢ κατακρημνιεῖ,
 ἢ σπῖλον ποιήσῃ.

For Demetrius only came to Athens either to retake it when it had revolted, or to idle in dalliance through the holidays of his life. Casander made ceaseless efforts to retake it; for a moment even a ruthless tyrant, Lachares, held it in his own interest; or else the old democratic party struggled to clear out the garrisons which even the liberator had found necessary amid the gratitude of his faithless flatterers, and to restore the republic pure and simple. But though they succeeded in doing this after the death of Casander and the ruin of Demetrius in Asia, their antique grandeur of policy had been sadly marred by appeals to Pyrrhus for help against Demetrius, then to Lysimachus, and it was only the death of all the great generals and the distractions or insignificance of surrounding monarchs which gave even a temporary success to the bravery of Olympiodorus, who expelled the Macedonian garrisons, and of Demochares, who preached the policy of his uncle Demosthenes. The limited democracy which followed upon the timocracy of Demetrius Phalereus, and which ruled Athens down to the Celtic wars, and for some years after, did not make Athens greater, and certainly made it poorer. The burdens of the rich would doubtless have been as intolerable as ever but for the splendid gifts from various kings, who, partly for political, but partly for æsthetical reasons, were anxious to gain or to maintain the goodwill of the Athenians.

Thus through most of the earlier wars of the period before us (323-278) Athens was ruled oligarchically under Macedonia, for the remainder it was ruled democratically under the control of the bravest and most successful opponents of Macedon, and of that policy. At last it became nominally free, but so obscure and unimportant was its liberation that no historian except Pausanias has preserved the name of its deliverer, and we are reduced to fragmentary eulogistic inscriptions to discover the importance of the leading politician of the day.

Of the other Greek cities we have very little information, but enough to tell us that the events at Athens were repeated with but little variation. Thebes was rebuilt by Casander, so creating for him a strong centre of influence in Bœotia. Here too came the conflict between Demetrius, the pretended liberator, and the Macedonian party. Here too, after one conquest of Thebes, Demetrius was obliged to reconquer it, and this time to put a garrison into the Cadmea, as he had put one into the Peiræus and the Museum to secure Athens. Similar conflicts took place at Argos, at Sicyon, at Corinth; Megalopolis alone, now one of the most important towns in Greece, seems to have held firmly with the Theban and Macedonian party. There was in fact no room for any independence in Greece save in those mountainous and inaccessible cantons where military operations were tedious and expensive, and hence rapid conquests impossible. This was eminently the case with Sparta, attacked both by Demetrius and Pyrrhus during this period, but unsuccessfully; with Ætolia, rapidly rising by contrast with the cities of the plain into political importance; and with the Somewhat different was the position of the Asiatic cities, and again of the islands. Asiatic cities had long been accustomed to the suzerainty of Asiatic kings and satraps, and to reconcile a moderate amount of local independence with submission to greater power. The effect therefore of 'freeing Hellenic cities' was not so marked among these large and rich cities as in poorer but freer Greece. In the islands, where the interests were predominant, and where the king or its satrap did not make heavy requisitions for supplies, they seem not to have found the intolerable burden to be subjects. It had been for a long time back possible.

But there were a certain number of cities, all Rhodes, then Cos, and cities on the coast, by nature and art from land as to be islands, such as Cnidus, Halicarnassus, Byzantium (the Euxine). In the full flood-tide of Persian invasion these cities learned from the example of Halicarnassus, and afterwards of Byzantium, what they could do, and how they could put impracticable. Close investment by land and sea was almost impossible, and so the policy of the kings was clearly one of neutrality towards these cities. To them, on the other hand, neutrality was even more necessary, for it enabled them to prosecute their merchant and carrying trade with enormous profits during wars between their allies on the mainland. Thus these cities gradually acquired an importance quite extraordinary in the Greek world. Their league and their policy of keeping the seas open for commerce will be discussed hereafter, but we cannot pass over the rise of Rhodes, which appears suddenly, almost as one of the Diadochi to Alexander's power.

Pausanias tells us (1, 4, §§ 5, 6) that in his day the Pergamene people asserted themselves to be descended from Arcadians, who had migrated thither with Telephus, the opponent of Achilles, so celebrated in tragedy. If this be so, Pausanias naïvely adds, all the other achievements of this people have been forgotten, since their resistance to Agamemnon's invasion, till the recent conquest of Asia Minor and the repulse of the Galatæ—in other words, they had no history before the days of Hellenism except their bold assertion of relationship to the Mysian Telephus. This legendary history indeed arose more from political astuteness than from antiquarian taste. When the day came that the Romans interfered in the East, and desired to pose as legitimate members of the Hellenistic world, it was at Pergamum that was elaborated, if not invented, the story of the Ænead origin of the Roman kings. It was thus of real political value to show that the Pergamene people were descended from the old Mysian ally of the Trojans, who had sacrificed life and incurred loss to sustain the greatness of Troy. The Alexandrians, who were aware of the motive, repudiated this piece of genealogy, and Aristo-phanes of Byzantium even rejected as spurious the prophecy of Poseidon in the Iliad (Y, 307) that the descendants of Æneas should reign in the Troad. Alexandria could claim no mythical history, and thought it absurd that her sister-upstart should do so.¹

In the case of Rhodes it was very different. Tlepolemus, chief of the Rhodians, figures in the Iliad, where he is slain by Sarpedon the Lycian, as if the poet had foreseen the future struggles of Rhodes to maintain a kingdom on the mainland. But in the account of Diodorus (v. 55, 56) Tlepolemus comes quite late in the mythical history of the island, which had evidently been colonised by Carians, Phœnicians, and perhaps Egyptians, before the son of Heracles, just mentioned, had come with his Dorian settlers. This appears not only from the legends, but from many features in the local worships of the island, such as human sacrifices, and the offering of a team of horses to Helios, by throwing them into the sea—practices which were not Hellenic. The stories of the Telchines, and their magic power in working metal, point also to the immigration of advanced handicrafts from the older cultures of Egypt and of Phœnicia.

In historical times the inhabitants were acknowledged Dorians, and the hero of Messene, Aristomenes, took refuge there; the Rhodian family of Diagoras, celebrated in Pindar's Odes, was foremost in Greece for distinctions in the great national contests at Olympia and elsewhere. We can therefore well imagine the contempt with which the Rhodians regarded such upstart pretensions to Hellenic pedigree as those of the Pergamenes, and I cannot but conjecture that much of the chastity and severity of Rhodian taste and manners arose from this feeling of Hellenic aristocracy. While the other Hellenistic capitals were distinctly new, and the asylum of a mixed and mongrel population, Rhodes, though its greatness dated only from the death of Alexander, might claim to be purely Hellenic. This fact affords us the key-note to all the modulations in Rhodian art, even though it was deeply affected by the Hellenistic instruments which it could not but adopt.

¹ Cf. Wilamowitz, Antigonos von Karystos, p. 161.

It is not our province to trace the earlier history of the island, or of the old confederacy of Dorians, in which its towns joined with Cos and Cnidus in worshipping on Cape Triopas. The only fact here requiring comment is the late foundation of the great city itself by the three older cities—Lindos, Cameiros, and Ialysos—which, though maintaining their separate existence as polities, made what the Greeks call a συννοικισμός, and settled the government of the island at the north end, in the new city called Rhodes. This took place in 408 B.C.—that is to say, near the close of the Peloponnesian war. Though our informant, Diodorus, only tells us the bare fact, it is not hard to see that some able politician foresaw the ruin of Athens, and the possibility of founding a new naval power on the lines pointed out by Pericles as the only safeguard for Athens—viz., to mind their business at home, and look after their navy. For this purpose an island was even better suited than a city like Athens, which had often to resist an attack from land forces. It was plain that Sparta, however successful in the war, would never be a naval power of this kind; and so we may give the founders of Rhodes credit for far-seeing genius in founding this new capital of a naval empire. Crete, indeed, was reputed in legend to have once occupied this position.

But the policy of the founder of the new city was not destined to take its effect for a full century, as Rhodes was obliged to work through its struggle of aristocracy and democracy, which lasted with various fortunes till the days of Alexander. The aristocrats were supported by Sparta, and again by Mausollus and Artemisia, who seized the island; the democrats at times by Athens, but generally by their own greater vigour and determination. In the days which concern us, the government seems in the hands of a numerous and wise aristocracy of wealth, which so fostered the interests of the lower classes that no internal disturbances are reported. Having at first resisted Alexander, and furnished Persia with her able admirals, Memnon and Mentor, Rhodes submitted in good time, and sent ships to the siege of Tyre. We know that Alexander had a garrison there, which the Rhodians expelled at the news of his death, but what Diodorus means by saying (xx. 81) that Alexander promoted and favoured it, and honoured it above all cities of his sovereignty by depositing there his will, I am at a loss to understand, for the whole account of Alexander's death implies distinctly that he had made no will. But it is more than likely that the Rhodians undertook to keep the police of the Ægean for him, and that he empowered them formally to do so. It may be some distortion of this that we read in Diodorus, for at Alexander's death Rhodes appears in a new position, recognised as a naval power of the first order, and also as the leading emporium of trade in the Levant. I do not think this sudden rise can be explained without some special action on the part of Alexander. His connection with Barsine, the beautiful widow of Mentor or Memnon, was no doubt used by the discreet Rhodians to influence the great king through his mistress. These are the conjectures I hazard to account for the fact related to us.

But the siege of Rhodes by Demetrius the Besieger is good evidence of the wealth and vigour which that city had already attained. It had not fought for any ideals but quietly acknowledged the real owner of the world, Alexander; then had kept up friendly relations with Casander, Lysimachus, Antigonus, and Ptolemy, its most dangerous as well as most profitable neighbour. It was the rivalry between Antigonus and Ptolemy for the command of the Ægean which brought upon Rhodes the great attack which it in vain endeavoured to avoid by neutrality and diplomacy. The Rhodians tried all that could be done by eulogistic decrees and votive statues. When Demetrius appeared with his army and engines, they were agreed to submit to him, and give him assistance against Egypt. But when he demanded a hundred hostages as guarantee of their submission—a strange mistake—the shrewd aristocracy made up their minds that the day of concession was over, and determined to show how dangerous was the policy of attacking them.¹

This siege of Rhodes may occupy us for a few moments, seeing that all the interest of the eastern world gathered about it, and all the world either helped in the fight or tried to allay it. Rhodes was managed by a wise aristocracy. We may imagine it the Venice of those days, and its navy had attained the efficiency which once had distinguished the Athenian. It had undertaken the safety of the sea-ways, and put down the pirates, who were already an organised force. No doubt it was in hunting pirates that the ships were trained to that speed and precision of evolutions which they displayed in the war against Demetrius. He, on the other hand, got the pirates to join him, and they formed a regular division of his fleet.

Diodorus has left us a long and brilliant description of this great siege—the terrible and splendid effect of the great fleet arriving in broad day and plainly visible from heights of the city, which was built like a theatre round its port;

¹ Diod. xx. 81 sq.

the large promises made by the Rhodians for valour, in the shape of money prizes, freedom to slaves, and pensions to the children and parents of those slain in the defence ; the enormous force of Demetrius, 40,000 men, with endless camp-followers, coming 'to make private profit from the misfortunes of the belligerents.' The Rhodians had only 6000 citizens to bear arms, and 1000 resident aliens, but they had abundance of slaves, great resources in war material, and supplies were sent them in abundance by Casander, Lysimachus, and, above all, by Ptolemy, who kept also sending in mercenaries in as great numbers as the city could well support.

The first great struggle was for the mouth of the harbour. Had Demetrius closed it the struggle would have been over. But the Rhodians kept it open by desperate fighting, and not only destroyed his engines but sent out swift cruisers, which intercepted his supplies,¹ captured pirate vessels, and made descents upon the mainland. Then Demetrius made his attack by land with the aid of that monstrous machine known as the Town-Taker, or Helepolis, which consisted of stories of woodwork, fenced with parapets and screens of raw hide, moved on wheels by the efforts of 3400 men, and discharging stones and arrows from all its stories. Even this, though it made great breaches in the wall, failed in its effect. Though some of the besiegers actually effected a lodgment inside the town, at the top of the theatre, and 'the women and children set up a howl as though the city were taken,' after a murderous conflict they were all killed or captured. It had been agreed that captives were to be ransomed at ten minæ for a free man and five for a slave—a very high figure. At the same time, when some one proposed to throw down the statues of Antigonus and Demetrius they had lately set up, they rejected the proposal with scorn, thus showing their superior political condition to the cities of Greece ; for even at Athens it was noted that the numerous statues of Demetrius Phalereus were all broken up, and the metal applied to the commonest uses the day after he fell. All the while there were embassies arriving from neutral powers offering their mediation, for the whole commercial interests of the Ægean depended on Rhodes. First came the Cnidians, and there was a short truce, but Demetrius would yield no point ; then more than fifty ambassadors from Athens and other Greek towns, and another truce and much discussion. Lastly came the commonwealth of the Ætolians, and they succeeded not for their better arguments, but rather because the siege was not progressing quickly, and Demetrius had counted over 2300 missiles shot from the walls in one brief night attack. This showed that the resources of the town were inexhaustible. So peace was made on condition of the Rhodians being Demetrius's allies, except against Ptolemy, and giving 100 hostages who were not office-bearers. They then paid all their debts of gratitude to their own citizens and friendly kings, but wishing to honour Ptolemy above all, sent to the shrine of Jupiter Ammon to ask if they might worship him as a god, and when they got permission they built him a temple.

¹ They even captured a ship with some of Demetrius's wardrobe, which they sent to Ptolemy, as being purple garments of a splendour only fit for kings to wear.

Here was the policy which Athens attempted, but which could not be carried out in a town full of half-hearted citizens and blatant demagogues. This was the only course open to small communities. But even in Rhodes it could only be maintained by great devotion on the part of the citizens, a perfectly steady and calm government, and, consequently, by the active support of great neutral powers. This policy then, that of the neutrality of island commercial states, had begun. The policy of confederations among small states had hardly as yet seen the light, and was hidden in the mountain valleys of Corax and Erymanthus. The reader will now have learned enough of the politics of the Greeks at this epoch to follow the necessary allusions in the succeeding sketches of social life and habits of thought. Far apart as they were from public life, and directly as they even avoided politics, the thinkers and quiet people of the age cannot but affect and be affected by international relations and the strife of parties in the state.

CHAPTER VI

THE RELATION OF ART AND LITERATURE TO THE SOCIAL LIFE OF THE PERIOD

WE have now given something of the political aspects of Greece—monarchy, the new and attractive idea in Hellenic political economy, represented by great sovereigns with splendid courts, and imitated by every petty prince even in title; aristocracies of commercial cities, like that of Rhodes, carrying out the cautious policy of commercial magnates; turbulent democracies insisting to the last on the autonomy of every city and the equal rights of all free citizens. Let us turn to the nearer and more intimate evidences of the social life hidden from us by the great troubles of the times. And in doing this let us ascend from the material conditions of life, including the luxuries provided by art, from the pictures of ordinary life given us on the stage and in the anecdotes preserved by historians, to the higher regions of thought, where the philosophers were thinking out afresh the deeper problems of life.

We may regard it as certain that the greatest bar to the spread of material comfort in classical Greece was the continued isolation of its small states. Apart from their constant wars, the difficulties which they all raised to the residence of aliens in any city—and their nearest neighbours were aliens—made any real community of ordinary life impossible. Nobody travelled for pleasure, still less did anybody think of residing abroad unless compelled by a legal sentence, or induced by the hopes of great commercial profit. Thus we know that in the details of everyday life the Greek cities varied very much more than do the cities of any large European kingdom. Even in this case the differences are far greater than appear at first sight. Take, for example, England and Ireland, separated by a stormy channel, though parts of the same empire. The highest classes in each, owing to constant communication, beginning with school life and ending with residence in the capital, have attained to a real unity of customs. But in the middle classes, and still more in the lower, there are innumerable small differences in the habits of everyday life which surprise and interest any accurate observer. Nor is it by any means to be explained by the English being nearer the great centres of civilisation, and therefore more advanced than the Irish. On the contrary, from a social point of view, the English are far behind their neighbours in many respects, and would, probably copy some details of Irish life if brought often into contact with them. But hitherto the middle classes, or rather all classes except the highest, have been really isolated, so as to be different peoples speaking the same language. I suppose the same thing might be said as regards the Scotch and English, but of the Scotch at home I have not sufficient experience to speak with confidence.

Let us consider one more instance, and here of neighbouring capitals, severed by difference of government and language, but very near to one another in many other senses—London and Paris. Without positive experience to the contrary, one might have thought that railways and steamers would of themselves have produced so constant an intercourse between these great foci of culture, that every convenient and practical discovery for the uses of life in the one would at once have passed to the other. And yet railways and steamers were plying for a whole generation before the first great Exhibition of 1851 brought real masses of French people to London. They found it, socially speaking, a perfectly barbarous place. The foreigner there felt himself a miserable alien, totally out of place, with no provision for his comfort or amusement. There are extant still the comic outbursts of disgust of French people who thought to get a Sunday's outing in the London of that day, and wandered starving along miles of pavement lined by closed shutters, finding a desert worse than the Sahara where they had counted upon recreation and plenty. Since those days the practical points of each city have been gradually imitated by the other, and yet it was only the other day that any large attempt was made in London to amuse respectable people in the open air on summer evenings. These instances will bring home to the reader what I mean by the isolation of the Greek cities up to Alexander's time—an isolation which made any stranger walking in a Greek town, if not disliked, at least remarked or ridiculed as provincial or odd, while his manners and customs were set down as not the right thing, even if practically better than those of his critics. The comic poets tell us that a dinner party at Thebes was totally different from one at Athens, and as to material arrangements superior; yet no Athenian of the classical days would have imitated his Boeotian neighbours. The large class of people who profess to study the Greeks, and only know them through the peculiarities of the grammar of the language, will appreciate my point when I remind them that it required centuries to establish in Greece a common literary dialect. Whether it would ever have been done by the spiritual predominance of Athens is very doubtful; not doubtful is the fact that it was brought about by the political union of Greece under Alexander, and the spread of the use of Greek by his conquests to nations who could not undertake to appreciate niceties of dialect. Moreover the 'common dialect' of Hellenism was not Attic, but a practical organ of communication which sprang up without a history, and is found complete in the next generation, to serve all the world of literature and philosophy for the next many centuries with very little change. This was the outward and visible sign of the unity of Hellenism.

As regards, therefore, the habits of ordinary life, it may be taken as certain that the conquests of Alexander and the wars of the Successors produced an interchange of ideas in the Greek cities such as had never taken place before. The Asiatic towns had in this respect already received part of their training. Their common obedience to Persia had got rid of those political conceits still so deeply rooted in Greece, and we have little reason to believe that Smyrna and Ephesus differed in the private life of their citizens at all so much as Athens and Argos, not to say Sparta. For they had long been mere units in the total of Asiatic cities under foreign supremacy. And though Alexander, and most of the Diadochi, left, or pretended to leave, each city in Greece its autonomy, it was not the same thing as of old. The alien, especially the Macedonian alien, was no longer to be despised or plundered as a mere outsider with no civic rights. Nay rather we may readily conceive rich and important aliens leading the fashion, even at Athens. How powerfully must the private life of fashionable young men at that time have been affected by the material comforts displayed in the household of King Demetrius the Besieger, or Casander, or any of the lords-lieutenant whom they sent to rule at their castle in Munychia ! The luxuries of life even reached the philosophers, and were exhibited in the most extravagant form by Demetrius of Phaleron, for ten years the legate of Casander at Athens, as we shall see at greater length by and by. Intercourse between the cities must have increased enormously, and though I am not aware that Alexander forced upon the Hellenic confederacy any regulations as to port dues and import duties, the absence of any complaints on this score seems to show that some reasonable uniformity had been attained, and that either foreign men might reside in or foreign goods be imported to any city in Greece without any annoying prohibitions.

The amount of Persian wealth poured into Greece by the accidents of the conquest, not by its own industries, must have produced a revolution in prices not since equalled except by the influx of the gold of the Aztecs and Incas into Spain. I have already pointed out (pp. 4, 5) how this change must have pressed upon poor people in Greece who did not share in the plunder. The price of even necessary and simple things must have often risen beyond their means. For the adventurers brought home large fortunes, and the traders and purveyors of the armies made them ; and with these Eastern fortunes must have come in the taste for all the superior comforts and luxuries which they found among the Persian grandees. Not only the appointments of the table, in the way of plate and pottery, but the very tastes and flavours of Greek cookery must have profited by comparison with the knowledge of the East. So also the furniture, especially in carpets and hangings, must have copied Persian fashion, just as we still affect oriental stuffs and designs. It was not to be expected that the example of so many regal courts and so much royal ceremony should not affect those in contact with them. These influences were not only shown in the vulgar 'braggart captain,' who came to show off his sudden wealth in impudent extravagance among his old townspeople, but in the ordinary life of rich young men. So I imagine the personal appointments of Alcibiades, which were the talk of Greece in his day, would have appeared poor and mean beside those of Aratus, or of the generation which preceded him. Pictures and statues began to adorn private houses, and not temples or public buildings only—a change beginning to show itself in Demosthenes's day, but coming in like a torrent with the opening of Greece to the Eastern world. It was noticed that Phocion's house at Athens was modest in size and furniture, but even this was relieved from shabbiness by the quaint wall decoration of shining plates of bronze¹—a fashion dating from prehistoric times, but still admired for its very antiquity.

If it be true, as we shall see, that all kinds of art—painting, sculpture, music, architecture—began to aim at producing great effects, not at conveying great ideas, we may be sure private life was only a weaker echo of this dominant tone, and sought by outward taste or display to gain credit for refinement and knowledge of the world.

It is remarked by Overbeck² that in the period after Alexander no new or original development of art took place, and that no city of Greece started an independent school. He therefore calls even the great historical school of Rhodian and Pergamene sculpture the after-bloom of Greek art. But, however true this may be, it must not blind us to the fact, which no one has better illustrated than Overbeck himself, how in this period very splendid works of art were produced. We still have them in sculpture. The Nike of Samothrace, a splendid female figure with flying drapery, standing on a marble prow aloft, and blowing her trumpet, was a dedication of King Demetrius (for his naval victory over Ptolemy), which his biographers have not mentioned, but which was celebrated enough to become copied upon coins, and was really so great that any older master, even Phidias himself, would not have been ashamed to own her as his work. And yet the name of the artist is unknown.¹ We may be certain that it was no decadent period of art when such forgetfulness was possible. We also know that the first great national struggle of the period—the repulse of the Gallic hordes which overran Greece in 278 B.C.—found its noblest expression in art, and that the victorious patriots chronicled their exultation in famous dedications to their gods, of which two at least, the Apollo (Belvidere) and Artemis of the Vatican have impressed the modern world as much as any remaining monuments of plastic art. It was the same national feeling of Greek against barbarian that gave life and splendour to the Pergamene school, which exercised itself chiefly in the history of this conflict and its earlier prototypes, and from which the so-called ‘Dying Gladiator’ is now the best-known specimen.

¹ Plut. Phoc. 19.

² Gesch. des Griech. Plastik. iii. 188.

But these great monuments only show that kings patronised art, which we already know; and also cities, great numbers of which are mentioned in connection with famous works. There was as yet no centralisation in art, as there was in politics. Patræ, Aliphera, Thespiæ,

¹ Overbeck, Gr. Plastik. ii. 314 sq. The learned have conjectured as the author Eutychides, a pupil of Lysippus and author of the sitting statue of Antioch, known from a copy in the Vatican.

Pleuron, Alyria (Acarnania), Ambracia, and a hundred other second and third rate, and quite new cities were celebrated for some masterpiece which people travelled to see. And so the immense diffusion of art, which is justly considered the main cause of its decay in deeper feeling and idea, must have produced a far greater influence on average Greek life than existed in earlier and more concentrated stages.

The same effects must have been produced by the development of painting, which is acknowledged on all hands to have attained its highest bloom just at this period. All the Hellenistic world was ringing with the praises of Apelles and Protogenes, and men were repeating anecdotes about them as of the great personages of the day. Our familiar ne sutor supra crepidam was the remark of Apelles to a cobbler who had rectified his painting of a shoe, but was thereby emboldened to ascend with his strictures to the leg. Protogenes had been for years painting his Ialysos in a suburb of Rhodes when Demetrius came to besiege the town. The Rhodians protested against his burning the suburb which contained such a masterpiece. Demetrius replied he would as soon destroy his father's statues. This was the picture which the jealous Apelles came to see, and was so struck dumb that for a long time he could not recover from his admiration. The greatest of these pictures were now no longer frescoes on walls, but paintings on portable panels; they were exhibited singly for money, as in New Bond Street nowadays, and even with more ingenious circumstance, for Theon of Samos had painted a famous single figure of an armed warrior rushing to battle, which was covered till a hired trumpeter had blown the alarum that the city was surprised, when the picture was unveiled to the excited spectators. Not only kings and cities, but wealthy private men could acquire and hang these pictures, and we may be sure that lesser artists copied or produced for lesser people what was in fashion among the great. They were strongly individualistic, whether it was the patron who got his own countenance, or his battles, or his hunting perpetuated by art, or the artist who, though he represented something without, thought all the while of the effect he would produce as an artist, and who knew that a work by an author of great name would interest men more than the same—I will not say a superior—work sent forth anonymously. Hence these artists are so jealous of their fame and so envious of rivals, as all the anecdotes show. This strong individualism underlies every development of the age.

I notice as pointing in the same direction—that of wider diffusion and therefore larger effect on average life—the great extension in the range of subjects both of sculpture and painting. As in the early Middle Ages so in classical Greece, these arts had begun in the service of religion, and if not strictly so, at least in the service of the state, representing religious or semi-religious subjects of mythical celebrity. But now, as in the days of Raphael, portraiture of distinguished individuals became a separate and flourishing branch of art. Alexander refused to sit to any sculptor but Lysippus, to any painter but Apelles, though many others represented him on canvas and in marble. So all the early Diadochi—Antigonus,¹ Demetrius, Ptolemy, Casander—had celebrated portraits of themselves made in bronze or in colours. So too the secularisation of art led artists to devise portrait statues or pictures of old and ancient men,¹ of whom no authentic likenesses were extant, the artist showing his talent by ideal heads of Homer, Hesiod, Solon, Sappho, Æschylus, and other such worthies. It is interesting to note that at the same time the frequency of athlete statues diminished. Athletics were out of fashion, the greater people who could pay for statues did not compete, and the cities preferred the newer kinds of art at home to this once famous form of dedication on the site of victory. This drawing of imaginary portraits was accompanied by the fashion of drawing allegorical figures, in which the artist showed his talent in suggesting even spiritual qualities of a transient kind. The extent to which this allegorising was carried is quite a striking feature in the spirit of the times. Not only were the great mummeries at Alexandria or Antioch carried out like those of the later Middle Ages in Europe, with a host of allegorical figures representing the four seasons, plenty, war, famine, each city in the empire, and so forth, but there was even a famous statue of the Nick of Time,² and a famous picture of Calumny, surrounded by her personified circumstances. This latter was suggested

¹ It was noticed, apparently as a novelty, that Apelles painted the first Antigonus, known as the one-eyed, in profile, sitting on horseback, and not in full face, in order to conceal the defect, 'so that,' says Pliny, 'what was wanting to the face should rather seem wanting in the picture.' Cardinal Wolsey is said to have been painted in profile for a somewhat similar reason. I may notice that in Egyptian art profile portraits (reliefs) were the general rule.

¹ All the famous Athenians of this and the previous generation, Timotheus, Iphicrates, Chabrias, Konon, Lycurgus the Orator, Demosthenes, etc.—Overbeck, S. Q. p. 269. Then came the philosophers.

² See the full descriptions of this statue of καῖρος (as a winged youth) cited in Overbeck, S. Q., 1463 and following numbers. There had already been a ἄνθρωπος καιροῦ much earlier, composed by Ion of Chios. Plutarch tells us that Timoleon, that antique Garibaldi, set up in his house a shrine to Ἀντρομαλία or spontaneity. As he owed all his successes to sudden impulses, which turned out to be inspirations, we can well imagine him regarding this suggesting force as Socrates did his restraining demon. But the worshipping of this unknown and probably invented type is characteristic. The processions of Alexandria will be described hereafter.

by a passage in the painter's life, when he incurred a great danger—the anger of the first Ptolemy. Even more characteristic is the fact that the figures commonly spoken of as personifications of cities were in this age not so, but images of the Fortune of the City.¹ Thus Antioch, to take a very prominent example, had upon her coins a female figure with turreted crown and emblems of plenty, seated on a rock or mountain over the Orontes, represented, as was conventional, by a youth, part of whose figure was visible. This great capital, being new, and having no ancient shrine with its deity to be its tutelary genius, still more, perhaps, not requiring or deserving such a genius, set up the very secular conception of its τύχη, or fortune, in a personal form, and with the attributes of a deity. Afterwards such figures passed for personifications of the city itself, and so are handed down to modern art and have influenced modern language.

Our authorities fail us as to other art, but we may be certain that the appointments of the table in themselves gave great room for elegance of design and richness of decoration in gold and silver. And if the necessities of life rose in price, we may be sure that all these articles of luxury fell, owing to the increased production or transportation of them.

The expense of having a portrait taken in bronze or marble in particular, must have been considerably lowered by the device of Lysistratus,² who took a cast of the head in gypsum, and then copied it. This invention must be regarded as having an effect similar to that of photography in our own day. It reduces the artist to a tradesman, and lowers the whole conception of a portrait, which should reproduce

¹ This is said by late chroniclers to have been the portrait of a girl, who was formally buried alive under the foundations of the city, by way of good omen.

² Overbeck, G.P. ii. 130.

to inquire whether it us shows any spiritual side which not to the artists only, but to the lived. The most competent inquiry as capital ; first, the pride of comp.
technique, which men like Lysippu all through their lives ; secondly, th to produce great effects, such as was Rhodes, and still more in the pro Alexander to carve Mount Athos in town of 10,000 inhabitants lying in c poured from an urn a mountain torn features have already come before u trius the Besieger, the most characte and may be regarded as indicating a self-satisfied age, convinced that its earlier generations, and determined new improvements which its fortune duced. As Alexander was greater th so these early Diadochi had no noti they had not outdone their forerunn life and energy, like the men of the 1 far removed from that looking back the later

the venerable and majestic types of former days, but the new creations of the modern school, supple and beautiful, but rather effective than impressive, and showing the worldliness which had invaded Greek religion. So too in architecture, they first adopted the rich grace of the Corinthian order, and became the models for the great Roman builders, who appropriated this idea perfectly, while the older and severer schools were always strange to them. It was the same in poetry, as we shall see more fully in the chapter on Alexandria, the principal exponent of this age. The earlier Roman poets imitated almost exclusively the Hellenistic poets, and it was not till the Augustan age that with Greek pre-Raphaelitism came in the worship of older and purer models. Pompeian wall-decoration shows the same influences, and so we may see that the age was a great and fruitful age, in which there were many successful men—kings, politicians, soldiers, artists, merchants—who were strong enough to swim in troubled waters, and lived a life full of excitement and enjoyment.

But what about the many failures? What about those who had not this enterprise, or the capital to undertake the keen money speculations which brought back a hundred-fold? What about those whose serious views of life hated display and working for effect? Where can we get evidence on the life of these quieter or idler or unluckier sections of society? What about the frivolous and the unfortunate?

We have evidence concerning the extremes of this large residuum of society—the best and the worst of those who did not shine in the public life and richness of the age. The one is represented by the philosophers and their schools, the other in the genteel comedy of the day. I shall consider the latter first.

At no epoch of history does the separation of style and ... Greek curiosity and for Heller sense of style, and the care for it,

with this opening of great sluice-ga
We see it plainly enough in Aristot show a contempt of style astonishing contemporary of Demosthenes.¹ An this time onwards seem to have lost style or all appreciation of it. So also whom we shall treat presently, plain c was the object, nor did they disco write clearly, without careful training ing to act naturally on the stage wit study. It is only the artist in literatu and clearly. Hence these philosop their contempt for style, but at the co but often of that very clearness which

I anticipate these points in order opposite taste in the comic writers attended to style only. For the obje no doubt regarded themselves as the purity from the invading corruption Persian influences, was to avoid all and to show their skill by repeating reminded in this connection of the 'pure scholars' of the present day, who go on re-editing Æschylus and Sophocles and Thucydides with dreary iteration, each fancying that by two or three minute additions or variations in criticism he has done great things for the advance of human culture. The later rhetoricians, beginning with Demetrius Phalereus, thought they had done splendid work if they adorned an old commonplace of thought with some new tinsel; and, if they turned to history, neglected research and critical judgment for the sake of the 'purple rags' which they sewed on their narrative. But the orators failed signally in the very thing they affected. They added nothing to the thought of the world, and even degraded the very style of Greek writing. The comic writers did not fail so signally. The grace of Menander and his contemporaries, though not attaining to the highest bloom of the great Attic days, was yet very perfect grace, and as stylists they were not only pre-eminent in their day, but contributed not a little to the perfection of Latin literature by guiding the Latin playwrights. We owe Terence to Menander.

But when all has been said that ought to be, or can be, in praise of Menander's style, and when we come to inquire from him and from the New Comedy what they have to tell us about their age, the outcome is miserably small. They appear carefully to avoid all the great events of the day, all large political interests, all serious philosophy, and merely to reflect the idlest, the most trivial, and the most decayed gentility of Athens. They do not even invent new scenery, new framework to convey their elegancies to the audience. Starting from a commonplace as old as Aristophanes, the 'rape and recognition' of some respectable and therefore wholly insignificant girl, or from the passion for some girl in the hands of a procurer, they added a few

Attic society produced a whole literature of polite immorality, selfish ethics, and so it is usual to lament the irreparable loss of Menander, but it may be doubted whether history would gain much from a further acquaintance with him. We have his sentiments, and those of Diphilus in hundreds of fragments ; we have rudimentary alterations of much importance in the collection of Plautine plays, and in Terence confident that, except by some stray allusions, we have told us little more of the history, real life of the age.

This generality of treatment, this absolute avoidance of the special interests characteristic of which has given the New Comedy its name, widely different ages and people. The barbarous Romans, though their society was in other respects at total variance with the New Comedy, could nevertheless understand and the spendthrift, the sceptic and the matron and the courtesan there painted their characteristics ; while the plays of Aristophanes, literary and philosophical criticism of the narrow it all was! If, instead of bitter and scurrilous allusions to great personages,¹ which were frequent enough, and innuendoes against virtue and morals, they had boldly painted Demetrius the Besieger, or the Philosopher, or Casander's pedant brother, or the conceited artists of the day, what far deeper instruction they would have left us! Their personages are like the ingenious variations of second-rate composers upon a well-known melody, which exhibit grace and ingenuity, but enrich us with no new feeling. A single national air, with its inexpressible charm of distinct local colour—in fact of originality—is worth a whole world of these variations.

The same criticism applies to the tract known as the Characters of Theophrastus, a book far more praised than it deserves. In the form now extant it gives a series of portraits of various social vices—all of them forms of littleness or meanness such as are the characteristic of a shabby and idle society. Moreover, the drawing of these characters is not psychologically subtle, as is often asserted. The features brought out are rather those intended for stage characters² than those drawn from a careful observation of real life. The book has to me the air of a treatise not copied from

¹ Polybius, in refuting the scandalous charges of Timæus against Demochares, the nephew of Demosthenes, and chief of the anti-Macedonian party at Athens, mentions (xii. 13, 7) that Timæus had cited the comic poet Archedicus as his authority, and urges that the libels of the poet were not confirmed by the writings of the friends of Antipater and his policy, of whom there were many, especially Demetrius Phalereus. Cf. also, on the political complexion of the New Comedy, Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Græc., p. 436.

² How far the fourth book of Aristotle's Ethics may have been intended to give sketches of real life, is not easy to say. The famous portrait of the μεγαλόψυχος seems to me more of a stage character than anything else. But so large and controversial a question must be adjourned to another occasion.

matters of me. They were supposed character better than their neighbours.
though his practical philosophy was of friend Epicurus, studied in this very I Theophrastus, whose distinctive feature natural history of every kind, from st piety and pride. So Bolingbroke drew a series of propositions which Pope under his splendid style in the famous Essay o Characters it is the nature of man as s decaying provincial society—the passio people with no public spirit or interes omitted, even the stronger vices, and a upon the foibles'and vulgarities of every

This tedious itching to describe types fragments of a tour in Greece left us Dicæarchus.¹ The writer not only profes character to the inhabitants of each Boeotia, but even draws distinctions of the people of Attica and the Athenians. might be serviceable for a stage bound tradition. In a would-be observer of re doubt his accuracy in cases where a real

Perhaps the plays which had a little more than the slightest local colour were not translated by the Latin copyists, who could not postulate in their audience any knowledge of Eastern history. But all the personages, the scenes, the manners of the comoedia palliata of the Romans were Attic. If then we were to believe these elaborate studies of manners in Alexander's and his successors' days, the life of youth consisted in drinking and wenching, in squandering money, nay even in committing the worst kind of felonious assault without even the punishment of much remorse. The young man who is strictly brought up has to stay in the country and help to mind the farm. But how complete and oppressive an exile this was considered appears from a curious comparison in the tourist just cited (c. 4): 'To sum up, as far as the rest of cities surpass the country for the pleasure and the right use of life, so far again does Athens exceed them.' Accordingly the sympathy of the audience is warmly enlisted for the oppressed youth who escapes by stratagem from his watchful father, and comes to spend a night of debauchery in the city. He does this too with the connivance of elders, and through the machinations of a 'faithful' slave. For old men are divided into two opposed classes. The one is thrifty, morose, hard, censorious; the other indulgent, generous, lax in morals. If two old men appear in a play they are generally brothers, and generally opposed in this way. The mothers of the house are either imperious heiresses, who lead their weak and sneaking husbands no pleasant life, or more respectable cyphers, the mothers of girls who innocently fell into the most serious mischief, and are only saved from ruin by what an Irish judge called 'the fortuitous interference of Providence.' If the attending of night festivals was (as the stock incident of these plays implies) so disastrous to the character of respectable girls, with religious night services. It is ordinary Greek life.

I wish I could affirm that the frequent children, especially girls, brought up by slave-dealers, were equally rare in real increase of both wealth and poverty in when the requirements of genteel life by means of meeting them not forthcoming female infants may have been one of the to the alarming decrease of population. For though it may have been so far that the infant seldom perished, those death were not likely to do so for the making it the mother of a family. Still stance about this matter of exposal which its frequency. In all the plays and fragments cannot remember a case occurring during play. There is no case, for example, of a child, when exposed by its desolate mother, leading to its recognition by the its consequent rehabilitation. There is when such a child is born it will have to the cases of exposal mentioned are in the best and greatest, to fixed models, that if one great master sanctioned this device we may be certain to find hundreds of direct imitations, and so the pedants of after days are led away to state as natural, or as ordinary, what is really the invention of a single brain. In all our social inferences from Greek literature caution on this point is of capital importance. Thus every heiress in the plays is imperious, disagreeable, disgusting to her husband, often indeed only because she will not tolerate his immoralities. Of course there were at Athens and throughout Greece plenty of amiable heiresses—seven thousand who had not bowed the knee to Mammon. If we believe the New Comedy there were none. So also there is no colour in any profession save one. The skippers who come into port from foreign parts are all the same. The soldiers are all the same—cowards, braggarts, and defeated in love. Menander declared by the mouth of one of his characters that not even the gods, if they tried, could produce a polished soldier. Yet in that day, when the profession was the leading one of Greece, there must have been plenty of soldiers of fortune similar in type to Xenophon, and far more cultivated by travel and experience than their Attic critics. But the use of an un-Attic form, or a local name not recognised at Athens, would be enough in Menander's day to set them down as boors. And so Menander himself and his fellows met their just reward at the hands of the pedants, who have set down with implacable severity the list of forms wherein even the exquisitely polished dialogue of the New Comedy had degenerated from the classical perfection, the prisca ars loquendi of Plato and Aristophanes.

But let us pass from these lay figures in the New Comedy to the only profession treated with real variety, and with a living appreciation of its various phases. In the courtesans even if we did not know that there was about them in the next generation Athenæus with most of the gossip in There was no doubt one side pronounced which Menander's refinement could ribald talk, and so far his pictures were we have the queen-courtesan, Thais, Muse to celebrate—splendid, fascinating a leading figure in Athenian life ; we have coarser species, the Philenium of the Asinaria preferences, but is quite content to be faithful to her favourite's father, and enters into the old sinner and his indignant wife brutal naïveté. We have the slave of career is marked out by hard fate, and her infamous profession, nay, we have Dame aux Camélias, the Bacchis of the sacrifices her own interests for the sake of as the good angel of the house, smooth promoting his respectable marriage and

Of all the pictures of courtesans, most morally reprehensible, though the whatever virtues there may be connect

Far more disgusting than even these portraits in the New Comedy are the many pictures of immoral old age, of fathers indulging their sons in vice, and conniving at it, nay, worse, taking part in it, in the presence of their sons. The mere mention of such a thing is more than enough for modern readers, and I will merely append in a note the argument of Plautus's Asinaria, to remind classical scholars of the facts.¹ The apologies of the Grex at the end of this play, and of the Bacchides, for the conduct of the old men, are exhibitions of the very worst epicureanism 'of the stage,' and we may indeed wonder how the solid Romans of the second Punic war, a great and sound society, could have tolerated such pictures of vice as would have been thought outrageous if occurring at Rome. How could the Fabii, the Aurelii, the Marcelli of that day endure that their youth should be made intimate with the society of courtesans, as a part of elegance and culture? It would be irrelevant here to discuss this question. Suffice it to say that we now tolerate in book shops and even on our tables French novels which, if printed in English, would be subject to prosecution by the law, and which no respectable bookseller would venture to advertise. In some such way the Romans may have tolerated in the comoedia palliata things which would have been revolting to them if represented as Italian.

What we have said concerning the evidence of comedy

¹ Senex D. vivens sub legibus uxoris Artemonae, optat favere amoribus Argyrippi filii data pecunia. Itaque D. mandat servo Pellaeo, qui afferebat pretium asinorum Saureæ, a quo illos emerat, numerari illam pecuniam L. servo suo. Illa pecunia defertur ad Philenium amicam Argyrippi. Consentit Argyrippus Philenium esse una nocte cum D. patre. Diabolus rivalis et patris et filii, iratus ob praereptam amicam Philenium, detegit omnem rem A. uxori D. per suum parasitum. Artemona advolat, ac trahit D. maritum e lustro.

at Corinth, at Thebes, possibly even in These people, idle, for the most part society, spent their earlier years in later in sentimental reflections and serious object in life, and regarded the affair as more interesting than the rise or the gain and loss of a nation's libe the people of our day who spend a novels from the libraries, and who ca nal variations in twaddle not only wit interest. They were surrounded with more intelligent and interesting, for in were bound to exercise their brains, an had a great object—liberty—to give th life. The relations of the sexes in t society were bad, owing to the want women, and the want of earnestness natural consequence a class was found, slaves, who took advantage of these culture to fascinate unprincipled me relations which brought estrangements, home life of the day.¹

But there were far lower classes in society, if not in morals, than these people, whom we might call the gentry of Athens. There were far larger masses in all the Greek towns more prominent, and therefore more easily judged. I do not speak of the parasites, another very small class which gained notoriety from the stage of Epicharmus rather than from real life, and so was copied for stage purposes till we have got to believe that parasites were as plenty as mendicants are now. The real parasites of Athens were not these few miserable starvelings, but the mob of Athens, the mass of free but poor citizens who had been taught by demagogues and by pretended patriots to depend not on their industry but on their politics for bread. They were taught the doctrine, not yet extinct, that the only way to make a poor people prosperous is by Autonomy, by driving out all foreign influences, by prohibiting foreign competition, and by letting people manage their own affairs. As every pauper then had a vote, we might well expect to find what has been already mentioned, that the use made of Home Rule was not to extend manufacture or trade, not to reward diligence and thrift, but to plunder the rich for the sake of the idle poor. Just as the tyrants of old had exiled and confiscated and murdered to obtain wealth, so the Democrats exiled and murdered and confiscated to enrich themselves; but finding, as is always the case, that riches so acquired have wings and fly away, they became the parasites of any foreign potentate who chose to subsidise them; they decreed divine honours to the man who sent them corn, and so we have the this and the next chapter to alter the impression he has produced. Indeed his account of Athens in the next generation (iii. 1, 228) is to me quite inconsistent with it. A people wholly given up to trivial and vicious living do not recover moral strength in a generation. But I must not further anticipate what I have to say.

not be persuaded— what men can?— and decadence were their own fault, proclaim any foreign cause as the source they were led to believe that some external to their own thrift and character would bring prosperity. According to a now common saying, 'bring money into the country.' But what was that there is a political alchemy which could transmute the dross, and transform by legislation the poor and the dishonest into a prosperous and honest nation.

I will add that there were two important causes which, both at Athens, and in a large measure out all the Greek cities, helped to do this. In the first place, the nation had always been a nation of talkers, who delighted in the art of putting things forcibly and plausibly. It was a mistake to think that this 'fatal fluency,' which in another connection, acts only on the speaker, in Athens, came to be characteristic of the speakers themselves as well as of their audiences, and from long position they naturally persuaded themselves of the vital sincerity of their policy. Thus the knowledge of the speaker's character passed into the enthusiast, and the line of demarcation between the two classes was

Such was the game played with the words liberty and autonomy in the days when great Hellenistic empires were taking the place of the little independencies of former days. But the evils were increased by the second cause to which I have alluded—the apathy and indifference of the ‘better’ classes. What wonder is it if in any age the ignorant and needy are misled, when those who have leisure for politics, and education to discern the truth, stand aloof in contempt, emigrate in disgust, or squander as idle absentees, or still idler residents, the time and means given them to benefit their country? We have just seen what the society of cultivated people at Athens was, as understood by the New Comedy. They had long lost all interest in politics, and perhaps naturally enough the recent loss of imperial powers made them feel how poor the duties of Greek citizens had become. But to recover a Hellenic federal empire cannot have seemed to them as impossible as we now know it to have been, and most certainly the total want of public spirit in the better classes was one of the worst signs of the future. They had even lost all taste for serious literature and high thinking. In the so-called middle comedy of the previous generation there is still some interest shown in philosophic systems, and even in schools of poetry—in fact, in the higher life of men apart from politics. But all this is gone from the theatres of the New Comedy. Idleness, frivolity, luxury, self-indulgence, are the attributes of the society which went to see its own reflection upon the stage. These people cared little whether Casander, Polysperchon, Demetrius, or Demochares ruled the agora, provided plenty of salt fish came from Pontus, fine wheat from Egypt, and the demimonde kept them amused with their beauty and their wit. Accordingly the so-called mob, the ignorant and poorer classes, did not profit by that inestimable influence classes were worse, as for example Thebes, where the business was done, where there was even in the way of smart comedy, a great deal of money was spent in vulgar debauchery. Athens also seems to have been very bad. But on the other hand cities where we may assume a more earnest aristocracy, which promoted literature, it did not lead in politics. Such was Sparta, as we may judge from the noble independence against Polysperchon's forces (319), and from the traditions we see established in the Achæan League, beginning with the Peloponnesian War. Such was also Sicyon, and perhaps other cities. Sicyon, famed for its noble school of art, maintained close relations with the art-loving sovereigns of the capitals. It is accordingly in these cities that the aristocratic classes assert their influence, and form a constitution in which rank and wealth so closely combined.

But it may be urged fairly enough that Athens did not suffer from a peculiar estrangement from the aristocracy which is the most singular fact in the history of our period. No doubt all Greek cities suffered from the emigration of the young and v least in form. Phocion must have been almost alone in his attitude as a public man, persuaded of the hopelessness of any imperial policy, thoroughly at variance with the Home Rule cry, setting down its advocates as knaves and fools, surrounded by an envious, calumnious, thankless crowd, and yet devoting all his life to their service with the calmness of a great despair, and imposing on them his authority by sublime honesty and stern self-denial. Any other man, perhaps even Phocion in a later generation, would have adopted one of two alternatives: he would have made himself a tyrant, doing it calmly and consciously for the good of the people, as did many enthusiastic and able men in the course of that century; or he would have abandoned public life altogether and retired into the shade to live a life of philosophic leisure. I said in a later generation, for in Phocion's ripeness, before he had become too old to do more than hold a straight course, neither had monarchy become so respectable as to throw its glamour upon self-constituted autocrats, nor had philosophy yet abandoned those subtle and dry speculations which must have repelled plain practical men. Plato, indeed, from the aristocratic exclusiveness of his temper, Aristotle, from the circumstances of his birth, had afforded examples of retirement from politics, together with great dignity and seriousness of life. But their books were far too abstruse; their system of life was far too complicated, and disguised in dry metaphysic, to attract men of mature years or of a non-speculative turn.

In the generation before us all this was changed. Great practical systems of life had arisen, and persuaded, if not a large number, at least the most serious and valuable minds to give up public affairs and devote themselves to the pursuit of individual perfection and individual happiness.

CHAPTER VII

THE SERIOUS SIDE OF GREEK SOCIETY—THE RELIGION OF THE DAY

THERE is this great difficulty when we come to consider the serious elements which corresponded to the frivolous and ostentatious in this stormy time, that though the great practical systems of philosophy, and the establishment of philosophers as moral teachers, date from this generation, our accounts of these systems are not written till a long series of successors had added to, amended, and often depraved the teaching of the first great masters. Thus the explications and commentaries of Cleanthes and, still worse, of Chrysippus are now embodied with the lessons of Zeno, who was the original thinker whom we really desire to know; the bitter and scurrilous attacks on Epicurus, made by Stoic and other opponents of his school, well-nigh obscure the picture of that amiable sage, which we must pick out among contradictions and cavils; the scepticism of Pyrrho is joined to that of Timon the Sillograph, who is an important figure in the generation following the age of turmoil of the first Diadochi. Even the last and most minute historian of Greek philosophy, Zeller, has abandoned the task of separating what is due to each in these great schools, and Diogenes Laertius, our only important ancient source who gives separate lives of them, evidently confuses later legends and anecdotes with what is genuine.

But there are a few simple facts which will show the reader the rapid and momentous change that took place in the social position and importance of philosophers at this transition time. Socrates, as we know, fell a victim to popular dislike, and to a strong conservative feeling in religion, which regarded his innovations in education and morals as dangerous to the state. Nor is there any truth in the legends, invented later on, of the remorse and repentance of the Athenians. Plato was of no political or practical importance in his day. His essays in public affairs were made at the tyrant court of Syracuse, and we never hear of his advice being asked and offered, like that of Socrates, at any important public conjuncture at home. So Aristotle, however his advice may have influenced Alexander—I fancy very little indeed—had no more weight in politics than the head of an Oxford college has now. To his many pupils the Don was once a sort of demigod, perhaps afterwards a respected friend, but no cabinet minister now goes by the advice of his former scholastic directors, not even, I am sorry to add, in matters of education.

At the close of the fourth century B.C. we find a perfectly new state of things. Partly from thoughtful people turning to philosophy instead of politics, partly from the philosophers turning to ethical instead of metaphysical inquiry, there results an exaltation of philosophers into public importance such as has seldom been witnessed in the world's history.

Perhaps the earliest signal instance of this change is the story told by both Arrian and Plutarch of the murder of Clitus by Alexander. When the king was shut up in his tent in a frenzy of despair, the first people who are sent in to console him, as the clergy would be summoned now, are two philosophers, Anaxarchus and Callisthenes, and we even hear that the line taken by Anaxarchus in his consolations—the assertion of the divine right of kings, that can do no wrong—was thought immoral and injurious to the conqueror's after life. But this may have been invented to account for Alexander's growing orientalism. I think we have no reason to doubt the fact that philosophers were called in professionally to minister in cases of grief.¹

We have again, in 322 B.C., three or four years later, an embassy sent under circumstances of great public danger to Antipater, when he insisted upon the extradition of the anti-Macedonian politicians at Athens. Such embassies had been sent to Philip and to Alexander before; but now we have a new kind of member—the venerable Xenocrates of Chalcedon, a metic at Athens, no citizen, but the head of Plato's Academy. He was regarded as the most weighty and venerable person next to Phocion at Athens, though he never appeared in the city, says Plutarch (de exilio, 10), but one day in the year to see the new tragedies performed; all the rest of his time he spent in the retirement of the Academy. He was therefore no popular figure in the streets of Athens. The rude old Antipater, who was impatient of all Greeks, but above all of Greek philosophers, would not listen to him. The mission of Crates to King Demetrius, a few years later, speaks the same kind of feeling, and introduced a permanent fashion, of which the best known case is the visit of the three philosophers to Rome. It is analogous to the mission of the Christian bishop from mediæval towns to treat with an enraged conqueror.

¹ There are several cases of this in Descartes's correspondence, cited in my Life of Descartes (Blackwood, 1882), especially his letter to the Princess Elizabeth on the death of Charles I.

Here then was a growing power so strongly felt that there was one more public attempt made by the extreme democratic party to put it down by law. For we cannot hear of any philosopher of any school who favoured the mob. All the advanced thinkers adopted and defended the idea of royalty so repugnant to the older Greeks. Accordingly the democracy, as restored by Demetrius the Besieger, adopted the proposal of a certain Sophocles, that under pain of death no one should keep a philosophical school except with the consent of council and popular assembly. This was accepted as a decree of banishment, at least by the Peripatetic school. We are assured that at this time Theophrastus, the successor of Aristotle, had 2000 hearers, and it is not likely that his advocacy of an old doctrine was by any means so popular as the newer and more original lectures of Zeno and Epicurus. Within one year, we are told, the proposer of this law was prosecuted by an adherent of Theophrastus (or Aristotle), and though defended by Demosthenes's nephew, Demochares, the leading democrat of the day, was fined and his law repealed. The comic poets, the mouthpieces of the frivolous people, were against the philosophers.¹

Why was this law so suddenly repealed? The law itself was indeed one of those spasmodic conservative efforts

¹ Diog. Laert. v. ii. § 38 ; Athenæus, xiii. 610, quotes from Alexis :

τοῦτ' ἔστι 'Ακαδήμεια, τοῦτο Ξενοκράτης πολλ' ἀγαθὰ δοῖεν οἱ θεοὶ Δημητρίῳ καὶ τοῖς νομοθέταις, διότι, τοὺς τὰς τῶν λόγων ὥς φασι, δυνάμεις παραδιδόντας τοῖς νέοις
ἐς κόρακας ἔρρειν φασὶν ἐκ τῆς 'Αττικῆς.

made at intervals by the Athenian democracy to protect themselves from a danger which they habitually overlooked—that of free discussion in matters of ethics and religion. The usual practice of the democracy was to avoid all interference with the philosophers, though the prosecution of Socrates and of Protagoras and of Diagoras, the law of Critias under the Thirty Tyrants, and the present action show that it asserted the right of interference. As this right was therefore acknowledged, I can see no striking change of politics to account for its repeal. I cannot but conjecture that as the Athenians were then in that sorry plight when people give up working for themselves, and look to laws and accidents to support them, when they forget that industry is the real source of wealth, and hail tourists or foreign princes as bringing them wealth—to such people the banishment of the philosophers would entail the disappearance of some thousands of pupils, many of them foreigners, who spent their money in Athens. Hence I conceive the reversal of Sophocles's decree to have been caused by no higher motive than a mean money consideration.

But however this may be, the statement that King Lysimachus of Thrace likewise banished all philosophers from the cities of his kingdom¹ corroborates our view of these men's importance, even though we find it hard to understand his policy. With this rude soldier, who had committed terrible crimes in his old age, and within his family circle, it may have been the out-speaking of the philosophers which led him to regard them as Herod did John Baptist. He knew well enough the power of words, for he subsidised a comic poet at Athens to write down his enemy King Demetrius.

We hear of a direct accusation of Theophrastus by

¹ Athenæus, xiii. 610.

Agnonides for impiety, which also failed,¹ and so we seem to hear an echo of the last struggle of the old traditions against the new schools of thought. From henceforth all opinion is free at Athens; even Epicurus, with his hardly-veiled atheism; Zeno, with his monotheism; the sceptics with their disturbing logic—all are not only tolerated, but enjoy high position and social respect at Athens. We have the text in Diogenes of a decree giving Zeno the Stoic—a stranger from Cyprus—public laudation and the honour of a public tomb. We have the rights of citizenship constantly offered to these men. We see them the friends of kings. We find them the advisers of politicians.

¹ If we may trust Bernays's reconstruction of the Tract on Piety (περὶ εὐσεβείας) from the quotations of Porphyry, Theophrastus was indeed a dangerous opponent of orthodoxy. For he there argued that the whole system of sacrificing animals was both offensive in itself and inconsistent with true piety. It violated the obligation of general benevolence towards other living things, it substituted occasional and costly acts of religious service for the daily duty of worshipping the gods, and replaced the pure and natural gifts (of the fruits of the earth) by a gross and bloody gift, merely invented to cloak the gluttony of the sacrificers, who invariably feasted upon the victim, and therefore selected not the cleanest but the most palatable beasts. Theophrastus appears as a vegetarian, allowing no slaughter of animals unless they be harmful to men. How this attack on sacrifices must have offended the orthodox, I need hardly insist; it is notable as evidence of the Rationalism or Aufklärung which had taken place in religion, for it seems to have made no great stir in the world. Let me add here an interesting case of Rationalism even in the Delphic oracle. Hegesander the Delphian (Athenæus, ix. 400) says that in the days of Antigonus Gonatas there grew such a multitude of hares (possibly rabbits?) in the island of Astypalæa that the inhabitants sent to consult the oracle what they should do. They were simple and believing people. The oracle advised them—not to make prayer and sacrifices and offerings to the gods, but—to keep dogs and to take to hunting; and so they killed 6000 of their tormentors, and saved their pasture. We may imagine the amusement of people with modern notions when this reply was issued to the formal and solemn inquiry of the islanders.

And this happened at a time when the historians of philosophy tell us that original genius had decayed, that Plato and Aristotle had left no successors worthy the name, and that philosophy had become the recreation of the idle, and not the study of the sage.

All this is to me a false way of looking at things; the age of the Diadochi was not that of decadence, but of splendour in the practical philosophy of the Greeks.

For, first of all, the audience was completely changed. Instead of attracting only the idle and the rich, who had time for metaphysic and taste for refinement both of manners and of thought we find the once elegant society of Plato recruited in the newer schools from men of low birth, of poor and foreign extraction, of ungainly appearance. From these come the great masters of the schools. We find them teaching in other cities, Elis, Eretria, Megara, Colophon, and bringing an acquired reputation with them to Athens, as a German professor who now advances from Greifswald or Marburg to Berlin.

We may also be quite certain that the inner quality of their audience underwent far deeper changes. I have said already that a large part of the able and energetic youth went off to foreign military and civil service. But there were others weak of body, wanting in physical energy, detained by family circumstances, or even by the contempt of mere money-making, who were driven to abandon all contact with public life by the crime and the misery of the times. Whether it was the educated luxury of Demetrius the philosopher, or the wild debaucheries of Demetrius the king, or the stupid raving of Demochares the patriot, or the coarse ribaldry of Demades the opportunist, public affairs became equally disgusting to sober and thoughtful minds. It meant the mastery of the brutal mob, or the furious exile, or the rude Macedonian satrap, or the old tyrant in the sheep's clothing of a deliverer. Who could tolerate public life under such circumstances? The public decrees were a series of begging letters, grovelling votes of thanks, bloodthirsty acts of vengeance, pretended outbursts of patriotism, which never represented, and could not represent, the sober and solid classes at Athens. There were many souls above all these things, with no scope for their life, no consolation for their leisure but to escape from this vulgarity and this crime into a purer, calmer atmosphere. To all such the schools were a haven of rest.

I am not going here to give an exposition of their systems. Any adequate account of either Zeno's or Epicurus's philosophy, travelling as they did over every field of knowledge and embracing every science, would require a volume, and a reader specially versed in philosophy to follow it. For it is quite wrong to suppose that these thinkers, busy as they were with practical life, despised or avoided speculation. Their philosophical theories demand hard reading and hard thinking, which is all the more remarkable, as they were only the means to an end—practical happiness, not an end in themselves, as they had been to Plato and Aristotle.

It was indeed this particular side of both these famous forerunners which gave Zeno and Epicurus their advantage. Plato's poetic vision and splendid generalisations had been upset by the minute observations and myriad diligence of his rival, but neither the synthesis of the one nor the analysis of the other had made men happier. Neither the one ideal republic of Plato, nor the 158 polities of Aristotle, with all his acute speculation on the causes of their growth and decay, had affected in aught the course of Hellenic history. The one had never come into existence, the others had been absorbed by monarchies, and the old duties of free citizens had well-nigh disappeared. People felt the hunger for a deeper faith, a surer hope, a larger charity than were afforded by Hellenic politics and Hellenic sympathies.

It redounds to the eternal credit of that wonderful race, that without a revelation from above, without an inspiration from within, at least in the stricter sense, they found the right solution of these new and burning problems. Their moral systems brought out into perfect and permanent day the majesty of duty, the splendour of devotion, the dignity of self-denial; they explained how contentment was real liberty, and passion the sorest bondage. Above all, the individual, not the state, was the unit and the whole with which each man had to reckon, and no public calamities, no national afflictions, no change of laws or constitutions, could rob him of that absolute spiritual freedom which is within the reach of every educated mind.

The silent antagonism to Plato and Aristotle is not more remarkable in these schools than their return to older thinkers, whose views they adopted and developed, not without the aid of those recent predecessors whom they despised. As regards physics they revolted from the spiritualism of Plato and Aristotle to adopt the cruder but easier doctrines of Heraclitus or Democritus; and as regards morals they felt that the true descendants of the great master, Socrates, were not the learned and speculative masters of the Academy and the Lyceum, but the outspoken and rude Cynic, Antisthenes, and the equally outspoken but polished Aristippus. These men had seized the practical side of Socrates—Antisthenes, his absolute liberty of spirit and free-thinking, even to a complete break with existing society—Aristippus, his principle that happiness was the first object of man, and that a philosophy which did not take account of pleasure was no adequate rule of life.

But these two men had been almost isolated thinkers, coming before their time, while the Greek State still overshadowed the individual, and they were obscured by the great theorists who deduced the perfection of individual life from the perfection of the state. Zeno took up Antisthenes's philosophy; he enlarged its basis and its interest by great physical and cosmical speculations; he reckoned with vulgar orthodoxy in religion, not as the other had done, by blunt scepticism, but by ingenious allegory and large pantheism, embracing all local creeds; and so he became a power in society and the author of a permanent school of thought, instead of spending his life as an offensive vagrant or as a surly recluse. Epicurus took up Aristippus's theory of pleasure, purified it from its grosser sensuality, enlarged it with theories of the world and of knowledge, stood aside from the popular religion without declared controversy, substituted personal friendship for the decaying bond of patriotism, and so created a theory of life which lasts fresh to the present day.

All competent historians of philosophy have noted how similar in character and aim these bitterly opposed schools proved themselves. Both sought the attainment of the summum bonum or supreme happiness. Both asserted it to be attainable in this life, but only by the true sage. Zeno started from a large conception of the universe, ruled by the laws of a Divine providence, and exhorted his hearers to ascertain and conform to these laws, promising perfect happiness to him who regenerated his soul by following the great voice of nature, by obedience to the will of God in His ordering of the world. Thus the Stoic sage became the forerunner of the Puritan; he was suddenly, sometimes even unconsciously, transformed from one of the world, from a fool in the Old Testament sense, to a state of wisdom or grace differing in kind from his former state. He was absolutely free, for no power could shackle his mind, and he would leave his body like a garment in the hands of the tyrant if imprisonment or torture assailed his happiness. Nay, he was rich with unfailing treasure, though an hungered; he was a king, though in the condition of a slave.¹ He held the doctrine of Assurance in the highest degree, and as he himself was incapable of sin, so the righteousness of the fool was but filthy rags, his virtue dross, his knowledge absolute ignorance. Thus while this doctrine preached the total insignificance of the single man in the ordering of the world, and his duty to submit to the law of providence, which might allot him a poor, a painful, a distressing place, and to regard it as the best and happiest state; on the other hand the lofty position given to the sage rehabilitated individual rights, and made it lawful for the philosopher to interfere and even to command in politics. Plato's Republic is thought trenchant and despotic enough in its control of private life, but what is it to the Republic of Zeno? For Diogenes Laertius tells us² that 'at the very opening of the treatise he declared all the received systems of education to be useless, and next that all those who were not good men were adversaries and enemies and slaves and foreigners, even parents of their children and brethren of their brethren and relations of their relations; and again that the good only were citizens and friends and relations and free, so that to the Stoics parents and their children are enemies if they be not wise. Again he says that wives shall be common property, both in his Republic and in his 200 Verses, and that neither temples nor law courts nor gymnasia shall be built in his city. About coined money he writes that it should not be provided either for the sake of exchange or to assist the absence from home of citizens; and as to dress, that men and women should wear the same costume, and that no part of the person should be concealed.¹

¹ There is no mistaking the Stoical training of St. Paul in the splendid periods where he gives all these formulæ a newer and deeper meaning, e.g. 'as deceivers, and yet true; as unknown, and yet well known; as dying, and, behold, we live; as chastened, and not killed; as sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; as poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing, yet possessing all things.'—2 Cor. vi. 8 sq.

² vii. 1, §§ 32 sq.

From such a system only can we explain the many respectable tyrants of the succeeding century, men who felt convinced that they knew perfectly what was good for their fellows, and held in a new sense that the philosopher was indeed the only competent king. They felt it lawful to seize supreme power, even by violent means, though their singleness of heart and honesty of purpose were sometimes shown when they found in practice that their theory would not work, and when they consequently resigned their sovereignty. So also the contempt of torture and death made Stoics very dangerous advocates of liberty, for if convinced that the removal of a tyrant was in accordance with the will of God, no regard for personal safety restrained them.

Thus in many directions, often inconsistent in principle and contradictory in effect, the Stoic theory stimulated the individual will, the power of personality, the assertion of conscience without regard to consequences. And if we justly wonder at such a system arising in a sensitive, pleasure-loving, dishonest, pliable, selfish race, the answer is clear enough.

¹ The trenchant character of this work caused it to be suspected as spurious, but Chrysippus declared it genuine. Zeno's speculations on sexual relations were such that the Stoic editors at Pergamum expurgated their edition, but they were detected, and the offensive passages were afterwards restored.

In the first place, the intellectual fascination of such a theory was in those days intense. It justified the thoughtful despot, and gave him a patent of royalty such as he had never before possessed in Greece. It consoled the desolate or the oppressed, for it taught him that the accidents and misfortunes of his life were but trifles, which were as nothing to the royal liberty of his faith. It comforted the politician, who saw the collapse of old and honoured liberties, the decay of Hellenic states, the invasion of Macedonian and oriental manners.

But when we touch upon these foreign elements, we reach the strongest side of Stoicism. The founder, and the great majority of its leaders, came not from Greece, nor even from Hellenic Asia, but from the rough and mountainous Cilicia, and from Cyprus, where Hellenic blood was deeply affected by oriental races. The mystic side of Stoicism, its pantheism and its allegory, as well as the calm resignation which it preached, bear evident traces of oriental imagination and oriental patience. This philosophy was therefore one of the first results, and perhaps the greatest, of Hellenism proper—the reaction upon Hellenedom of the thought and culture of the East.

The quietism of Epicurus was more Greek in its character, more logical too, and practical, and so within the reach of the large number of average people who could not grasp the ideal of Zeno. But it was also liable to grave misconstructions, and was denounced from the beginning as an apology for pandars, prostitutes, and parasites. Yet nothing could be purer and more Stoical than Epicurus's own life. He started, indeed, not from duty, but from pleasure, which he regarded as the law of every being, the claim ordained by nature as the spring of all action. But he took care to show by his life and doctrine that the pleasures of sense are fleeting, and involve great consequent pains, that our interest, when rightly understood, leads us to prefer mental to bodily pleasure—the delights of memory, of imagination, and of hope, to the tumults of passion. Thus virtue came to be identical with the longest and greatest pleasure, and duty coincided with interest. He declared also that the happiness of the wise man was independent of fortune, and even compatible with poverty and pain. He divided scanty rations among his pupils with perfect contentment during the famine of a long siege. He declared his perfect happiness when dying slowly of an agonising disease. Though he regarded the basis of friendship to be mutual profit, no one was more sentimental in his attachments.¹ This is indeed the most prominent feature in the long and explicit account of his life and writings left us by Diogenes Laertius. We see too in the great poem of Lucretius what majesty could be found in this advocacy of pleasure. But in the day of its birth, the real moment of the doctrine lay in its satisfying the want of that other kind of mind which revolts from Stoicism, which desires a clear reason, and a practical one, for every action, which desires to get rid of false theory and traditional wisdom, which is sick of politics and discontented with traditional faith, and yet will not be satisfied with mere scepticism. To such tame unpoetical natures Epicurus offered a system based directly on what they could see and feel, on the pursuit of such satisfaction as they all understood, on the putting aside of religion as a system of control or a source of fear, and supplanting it with a positive creed, a large and distinct body of doctrine.

¹ Upon this Wilamowitz (Antigonus of Karystos, p. 93, note) has well remarked, that it met one of the chief tendencies of the age. It was a day when other bonds among men had given way, when patriotism felt itself all astray, when the ties of family and of creed were loosened. Then it was that the eternal ineradicable bond of personal sympathy and of personal attachment came into the foreground, and was embraced even by such a system as that of Epicurus, which logically seemed to contradict it.

For this too is to be noted in that age, that it was not prepared for scepticism. This system was tried by Pyrrho of Elis, but he made no school and left no permanent trace on Greek thought.¹ The days were not yet come when the Platonists turned sceptics and brought the world round with them; it was still the age of positive teaching, of a firm belief that knowledge was attainable, of the substitution of philosophic creeds for the old religions. Second-rate people went in crowds to the second-rate successors of Plato and Aristotle, whose schools were now well established at Athens. But Xenocrates and Theophrastus could only lead such men as Demetrius of Phaleron, or Menander, and what they taught was not life but learning. Hence we may be sure that if the lesser number frequented the Stoa or the Garden, to hear men who were strangers in birth or in education, but stranger still in their creed, these few were indeed the solid and thoughtful minds of the day.

It is not at Athens only, but in many cities of Greece—at Corinth, Elis, Colophon, Heraclea in Pontus—that this sober and serious teaching made men look away from the folly, the turmoil, the war which racked the Hellenic world for forty years, to what true and solid satisfaction was still attainable. The Greek who had lost his autonomy politically regained it spiritually, and reasserted this new and greater liberty without elegance, with contempt of style, but with the sincerity of a deep conviction. The exquisite prose of Plato could not hold its place against the bald aphorisms of Epicurus, or the clumsy arguments of the Cypriote Zeno. These men openly despised any quality in style except clearness, and we may be sure that in this they appealed to the sense of their public, which was tired of idle rhetoric.

¹ We shall speak in due time of his only noted pupil, Timon of Phlius.

It remains for us to sketch briefly the external history of the establishment of these schools and their relation to the state and to the rulers of Athens, up to the invasion of the Celts. We can do this all the more easily, as no original school ever established itself except at Athens. Alexandria and Pergamum only continued what had already been taught at Athens. Many great thinkers began elsewhere, but, as I have said, they gravitated to Athens.¹ They were honoured indeed in their homes, as, for example, Menedemus in Eretria and Pyrrho in Elis. They received high compliments, such as statues; and solid ones, such as immunity from state burdens. These honours became the ordinary reward of eminent philosophers throughout Greece. But nowhere, except in Athens, do we hear of a philosophic body with endowments, legal succession, and the other rights of a corporation.

This idea, which has never since died out of the world, was due to Plato, who bequeathed his garden and appointments in the place called after the hero Hekademus, to his followers. But he was obliged to do it in the only form possible at Athens. He made it a religious foundation, on the basis of a fixed worship to the Muses—a *Μουσείον*²—

¹ An inscription found near Phocis, and quoted by Wilamowitz (Ant. K'ar. p. 291), speaks of a man as a Πυρρωνιαστὰς, or follower of Pyrrho, which shows that he had an acknowledged spiritual school, though not localised or endowed.

² The title Μουσείον, however, seems older, even in this connection. Diogenes Laertius (viii. 1 § 15) quotes Favorinus to the effect that the illegal and immoral objects were often the right of private association with fixed property. The society had the same right of enforcement that our clubs have, appears to have dated from Solon. The head or President of Plato's 'Muses' was the treasurer and manager, who invited guests to their feasts, to which each contributed his share (ἐρανος). The members had a right to attend lectures and use the appointments, such as maps, which were in the school. It was this endowment of property which saved the income and position of the Academy for centuries. He left the election of a successor to the vote of the club, and we are told that Speusippus was elected after the death of Speusippus over Menedemus and Heracleides—Aristotle remained a member of the Θίασος, but did not go to Macedonia.

This then is the first Academy, so often mentioned in our books, and of which our colleges are the successors. The religious character of the mediaeval universities, however, only an accidental resemblance to a feature in Plato's Academy. It was in associations were formed. They adopted the old form legalised at Athens for any private association; such a thing as a formally political club could be prosecuted as contrary to law. It was apparently on the ground of this legality of religious associations that the attack of Sophocles and Demochares was set aside, and the right of founding and keeping philosophical schools in the form of a religious club deliberately declared to be within the ancient law of Athens. The school of Plato, then governed by Xenocrates, being the bequest of an Athenian citizen who understood the law, seems never to have been assailed. The schools of Epicurus and Zeno were perhaps not yet recognised. But that of Theophrastus, perhaps the most crowded, certainly the most distinctly philo-Macedonian, and moreover in the hands of metics from the beginning—this was the school which was exiled, and which owed its rehabilitation not only to the legal decision of the courts, but still more to the large views of King Demetrius, who would not tolerate the persecution of opinion.

But it was the other Demetrius, the philosopher, the pupil of Aristotle, the friend of Theophrastus, to whom the school owed most, and to whom the world owes most in the matter of museums and academies, next after Plato. For this was the man who took care, during his Protectorate of Athens in the interest of Casander, to establish a garden and peripatos for the Peripatetic school, now under Theophrastus. He copied no doubt the model of Plato, and the will of Theophrastus, given verbatim by Diogenes,¹ shows us clearly the religious devotion to the Muses, the reverence of the founder Aristotle, and the care to bequeath the property in trust to the representatives of the doctrine, with a clause against appropriation or alienation.

¹ v. § 51 sq.—‘All will be well; but should anything occur, I make this will. All the furniture of my house I give to Melantes and Pancreon. But from the property contributed by Hipparchus I wish the following to be done: first, that all about the museum and the goddesses shall be completed and improved as far as possible. Then that the statue of Aristotle shall be placed in the shrine and the other offerings which

It is remarkable that the Stoic school—it too the school of aliens—did not establish a local foundation or succession, but taught in public places, such as the Painted Portico. In this the Cynical tone of the Porch comes out. Hence the succession depended upon the genius of the leader.

Epicurus, on the other hand, a full citizen, but with philosophical objections to the worship of traditional gods, seems to have left his property (his house and garden) to his natural heirs, subject to a charge for his successors; and accordingly the property of this school was dissipated after very few generations in the troubles of the times. But as Wilamowitz has well pointed out, the Hellenic habit of assembling under the sanction of some formal worship¹ were there before; then that the colonnade beside the museum shall be rebuilt not worse than before, and that the map which contains the circuit of the earth, be placed in the lower stoa,' etc. 'Our property in Stagira I leave to Callinus, all my books to Neleus. But the garden and the pleasure-ground (περίπατον) and the buildings attached to the garden I give all together to those of my friends hereafter enumerated who desire to keep school and study philosophy together in them. And since it is not possible for all (these) men to reside at home always, (I bequeath) on the condition that no one shall alienate this property or annex it to his private use, but that they shall possess it as a sacred property in common, and shall live together in familiarity and friendship, as is right and proper.' He then enumerates ten names, and makes provision for Aristotle's natural heirs being also admitted. 'And let them bury me in whatever spot of the garden may seem best, without extravagance either as to the funeral or the monument.' He then provides for the manumission of several slaves. There are executors named, and witnesses, and three copies of the will to be preserved separately.

¹ There were in both Aug. Comte and J. S. Mill curious echoes of the same kind of longing for some shrine, and some worship of somebody.

stuck to the Epicureans, and they raised their founder to this position, meeting for commemorative club dinners on the 20th of each month, and having a special yearly feast in honour of his birthday.

Thus we have philosophy and academic schools established under the countenance of the state, and favoured by kings and governors. There are many ribald stories told of the license and luxury of the regent-philosopher Demetrius, of his splendid banquets, of his yellow-dyed hair, his rouge and his unguents, of his minions and lady boon-companions. He did not indeed belong to any stricter school than that which conceded that there were good things not only of the mind, but of body and estate. Yet still to have such a patron, and to be protected by such a disciple, seems to us far beneath the dignity of any noble moral teaching. We recognise in this remarkable coalition the fact that philosophy was no longer the pride and privilege of ascetics, and of professional directors of conscience, but that it acknowledged a wider sphere, and was prepared to take help and countenance from kings and governments. No one in that day blamed Theophrastus for benefiting by the circumstances of the day, and we may thank him for the large wisdom which permitted a really great organiser to help in the permanent establishment of his school. When Casander and King Demetrius were gone, and Antigonus Gonatas, the friend of the Stoics, came to power, or at least to influence, under his father, the regent of Casander departed to Egypt, where he organised the second great and permanent Museum of the world, under the patronage of Ptolemy. This new achievement of the so-called Sybarite, together with the long catalogue of his writings given by Diogenes Laertius, shows that his mental activity must have been extraordinary, and even leads us to suspect that some of the adventures of his more brilliant namesake were transferred to his account. The vulgar and silly crowd of Athens, when it transferred its wild flattery to King Demetrius, and disgusted him with fulsome praise, destroyed in a moment all the statues and honours set up to his namesake and opponent. But for this ebullition of popular meanness we should have had inscriptions in plenty, and probably portrait statues of the man. Nothing is now left by jealous time but the scurrilous anecdotes in Athenæus and Diogenes, and the magnificent record of having established the Lyceum in safety at Athens, and founded the schools of Alexandria.¹

¹ I do not take any account of his fragments, which are so few as to offer no ground for judging his eloquence ; nor does the sentence quoted by Polybius (29, 21) with extravagant laudation show us more than that he remained in high repute as a writer for 150 years. But that is something.

CHAPTER VIII

THE GOLDEN AGE OF THE HELLENISTIC WORLD

As this book is not a formal history of Hellenism, I may allow myself the advantage of grouping the facts of social importance according to a selection not strictly chronological. The Greek world is now growing so wide, and has so many local centres, that the history of the third century B.C. is very complicated, and for our purpose it is better to adopt for each generation some fixed standpoint, and look out upon the ebbing and flowing tide as it there appears. It is natural, too, to select the standpoint for the time most prominent, and so shift our observation according as the centres of interest vary. Some allowance must also be made for the nature of our authorities. If we have only a local source for a certain epoch of the nation's history, we cannot do better than choose this epoch for considering that department of the Hellenistic world.

It is for these reasons that, in entering upon this golden age of Hellenistic culture, and dividing it into generations, we shall leave Athens and settle ourselves at Alexandria—the greatest capital of the day, and the most sudden and successful novelty in this novel age. From it we shall consider the other great capitals of the Greek-speaking world. This will lead us in the next generation to transfer ourselves to Pergamum, no doubt a second-hand Alexandria, but coming into so much closer and deeper sympathy with the older Hellenic spirit as to produce in art and in culture a more perfect bloom. The last generation of this momentous century we shall spend at Rhodes, whose commercial policy, long respected by all, became of first-rate importance when the great kings of the Hellenistic empires died out suddenly and simultaneously, and left their wealth and power to ignoble or obscure successors. The Antioch of Antiochus Epiphanes will come next in order. Then, owing to our inestimable source—Polybius—coming into play, we shall turn back to Greece itself and to Macedonia, where ultimately the struggle of Hellenism and Romanism as independent powers was decided, the former thereafter sinking into the service of the latter.

During the whole of these five generations all the eastern world, as far as the Euphrates, was in constant ferment, and all its sovrans were related by marriage, by treaty, and by war, so that all take part in all this history. The general features of the external policy of these empires should, however, be indicated here in a few words, though they are familiar even to the English student from the brilliant sketch in Mommsen's History of Rome.¹

The Hellenistic world was divided, as Europe now is, into a complex of first-class and second-class powers, each pursuing a policy determined by its neighbours and their mutual relations. There were in the first place imperial interests, each kingdom seeking to obtain as much tax-paying territory as possible, and to secure its frontiers against encroachment by fortresses and by treaties. There were in the next place commercial interests, which became of such importance as to produce great wars, and to enlist in them nations apparently far removed from the cause of dispute. There were lastly sentimental interests, such as those of art, of ancient dignity and of culture, which, if they did not actually cause disturbances in the Hellenistic world, at least exacerbated enmities. The sovrans, too, of that day were allied as frequently and as intricately as the sovrans of modern Europe, for marriage with a subject seems to have been as much forbidden by fashion then as it is by law among us. Accordingly, if ever the balance of power was a definite idea swaying a great company of correlated sovranities, it was prominent then, and the frequent cause of wars for the sake of peace. Every encroachment by one great power was met by counter-encroachments, or by diplomatic protests from the rest. The second-rate powers even regarded such a balance as vital to their own liberties, and threw in their influence with the weaker side to redress the disturbance. No old alliance, no marriage connections, no conviction of the blessings of peace and dislike of war, prevented this kind of collision, which they often essayed, as we have done, to stave off by international arbitration, but with little better success.

¹ Book iii. chap. viii.

The main members of this Hellenistic world, related as I have described, were first the three great powers—Macedonia, Egypt, and Syria, as it is called from its Hellenistic aspect. Three great dynasties—the Antigonids, the Lagidæ, and the Seleucids—were the acknowledged and popular rulers of these empires, always connected by marriage, and always estranged by conflicting interests. Their diplomatic relations were complicated by a number of second-rate powers, some independent, some under their suzerainty, but always affording their rivals some ground of interference, and a stepping-stone to direct attack. These second-rate powers were, in the first place, Greece, which was claimed as a vassal country by the Macedonian kings, but always asserted somewhere its independence at the invitation or through the support of Egypt, whose superior fleets and subsidies were constantly making inroads on the influence of Macedonia. Next came the new kingdom of Pergamum, founded on the ruins of that of Lysimachus, and gathering his Asiatic provinces into a distinct and important unity. This kingdom, threatened on the seaboard by the Egyptian fleets, and from the inland side by the Seleucids, was bound more than any power to keep these empires in exact balance. Then we have the league of free Greek cities, reaching from the Black Sea to Cilicia, under the presidency of Rhodes, and well compared to the Hanseatic League of mediæval Europe. The fleet and mercantile influence of this power made it of first-rate importance as a defensive, though not as an invading power. Its fleet, indeed, in alliance with any sovran made him irresistible at sea.

There were, moreover, some outlying provinces which afforded strength or weakness in turn. Macedon had territorial possessions in Caria, which were of great value as a port of observation against Egypt. This latter dominion could indeed only be attacked by crippling its navy, or by seizing the discontented province of Cyrene, which seems, as it were, its Ireland, and which readily accepted any foreign potentate as a deliverer. Then Syria was assailable in Palestine, which had strong sympathies with Egypt ever since Alexander had favoured great Jewish settlements in Alexandria—now the greatest Jewish centre in the world. The Seleucids had also a long and precarious eastern frontier, and the deserts which lay between the eastern and western provinces of their straggling empire formed an indelible line of separation, laid down by nature, accentuated by language and religion, and which nothing but the genius of an Alexander could efface.

It was in this mass of common and yet conflicting interests that Hellenistic culture sowed its seed, and produced that remarkable harvest in art, in literature, and in culture which has not again been equalled till the days of modern Europe. As all Europeans, however differing in language, manners and religion, are, nevertheless, a distinct type of man, differing widely from the Asiatic or the African, so a Hellenist in the third century B.C. differed from a Roman or an Indian, and with this peculiar advantage over us, that since the breakdown of Latin as a common medium of intercourse we are getting separated into sections by our diverse languages, while every member of the Hellenistic world retained or adopted Greek. European civilisation will not indeed attain any real solidarity till some common language is required as a necessary supplement to the local mother tongues. The most exclusive and unsympathetic of all the nations which formed the Hellenistic world was doubtless that of the Jews; and yet we find our largest and earliest of Hellenistic books to be the so-called Septuagint—the Greek translation of the Old Testament made for the Alexandrian Jews and their proselytes. The Bactrian kings might well have been thought beyond the pale, and we know that the nations about the Indus reverted ultimately to their ancestral ways, yet the Bactrian kings have left us coins with Greek names and legends, which show that as many Iranian chiefs boasted their descent from the great Alexander, the echo of whose name still haunts the Afghan mountains, so a whole race of Hellenistic kings spread Greek art and some kind of Greek culture up to the very boundaries of India.

Every such large and vague unity as Hellenism or Europeanism requires not only definite bonds of similarity, such as language in the former, and, perhaps, religion in the latter, but the accentuation of lesser and indefinite likenesses by the sharp contrast of some totally different and antagonistic kind of human nature, brought up in different climate, associations, manners and creed. Thus the old Hellenic unity of opposed and conflicting states had been if not created, at least cemented and exhibited to the world by its antagonism to oriental and despotic Persia. This contrast, however, had been effaced by Alexander, who diluted the Macedonians with Greeks, and fused both with the Persians in civil and military employment. So the boundaries of nationalities were being obliterated, and the marked characteristics of Hellenedom by contrast disappear.

It is hard to estimate what would have been the loss to Hellenism, and so to succeeding ages, had not the want been supplied by a new and terrible kind of human being, the scourge of the world, giving depth to curses and to prayer, splendour to conflict and to victory, just pride and thankfulness to the champions of civilisation. For as the northern heathen are to the legendary Round Table of Arthur, so are the Celts (Galatæ) to Hellenism. Coming in with an irresistible tide of invasion from the North, strange in stature and in tongue, impious in religion and utterly inhuman in cruelty, these barbarians devastated Northern Greece far more terribly than the oriental hordes of Xerxes had once done, and they were repulsed only by the most splendid patriotism of noble men, combined with the visible interposition of the blessed gods. Then the tide flowed eastward, and finally stayed in the fertile uplands of Northern Asia Minor, there to remain a record for the truth of the great artistic outburst which celebrated the successful struggle of civilised men, though these were fain to be content with the compromise of tolerating a nest of mercenaries and freebooters in their midst, because Greeks could hire them to fight against their enemies, and, if need be, even against their fellow-savages.

Except the Egyptian king, who lay far away in safety from attack, every leading sovran in the generation before us made his fortune and his fame—his undoubted claim to be a leader of civilised men—by a great victory over the Galatians, which was celebrated, we may assume, in poetry, we know, in art. It was the victory of Antigonus Gonatas over these invaders at Chalcedon on the Bosphorus, the victory of Antiochus Soter with his elephants, the victory of Attalus of Pergamum, which gained for each of these princes his place in the imagination of the age, and which were celebrated by titles—Soter is an example—by coins, on which the elephant appears as he does on the colours of our regiments which fought at Assaye, and by the splendid artistic remains which have recently turned so much public attention to Pergamum. We know that the Apollo Belvidere and the 'Dying ~~Gladiator~~^{Ys}' owe their splendour to the excitement of genius caused by this great national struggle, which merged all petty jealousies and quarrels in the huge terror and pity of the real tragedy—massacre, rapine, indescribable outrage of the weak and helpless, insane devastation of the fruits of the earth, barbarous destruction of what centuries of art and culture had added to human comfort and delight. And if to the century of familiarity with the rude and godless ways of these Galatians as mercenaries we may trace some of the debased and barbarous features in later Hellenism—the defacing of solemn temples, the rifling of rich tombs, the ruin of fair gardens—still these savages contributed more than they took away, by affording a standing example of brutality, of lawlessness, and of indelible ill-breeding. Since the conquering days of the Turks we have had nothing like it in Europe, and the Turks were in many respects far superior to the Galatians. Perhaps the invasion of the Huns is a fairer parallel.

It will strike the reader as very remarkable that so signal a feature of the age should not have reflected itself more generally in literature, such even as it remains to us. I might reply that this literature is fragmentary and scattered by the winds of time in a manner almost unexampled for an epoch of culture and of books. And, again, what we have from this generation—the early part of the third century B.C.—is almost all from Alexandria, whither the Celts never came as conquerors but only as mercenaries, and where literary men stood far from the storm and anguish of the great invasion.¹ But the omission is really a sign how literature had drifted away from contact with the people and with the events of the day. It was becoming the apanage of pedants and critics, and sought perfection in form or accuracy, in imitation rather than in reproduction of the freshness and vigour of real life. Art had not yet fallen into this conventional state, and hence art took up the national struggle with the northern heathen as its greatest and noblest subject. We know this not only from Pausanias's description of the records at Delphi, but from the remains of Pergamum.² Hence we may know that the art of that day was greater than the literature. Even when the poets of Alexandria did condescend to celebrate actual events, it was rather a royal marriage or festival or religious pomp which struck them as a worthy subject. We know that Lycophron, the notorious enigmatist of the Alexandra, did compose tragedies on historical subjects, and he even approached the time and place of these eminently tragic events in his Casandreans. But it was the tyranny and cruelty of Apollodorus, their despot during the crisis, which occupied him; so that though he may have introduced a Galatian bodyguard of ruffians as abetting the tyrant, it was the old and vulgar topic of Hellenic tyranny—Phalaris and Dionysius over again, and not the outlandish barbarism of the invaders which he chose to represent. It is remarkable also that through this now forgotten but once popular tragedy the rule of Apollodorus becomes the typical and signal instance of cruel oppression, as if this wretch in his mushroom town were to be spoken of in comparison with the great criminals who left deep scars upon the history of ancient and famous Hellenic states.

¹ Callimachus, as we shall see, does his best to make the second Ptolemy a hero in this struggle, but on very weak and absurd grounds.

² The only detailed account we now have of the Celtic invasion of Greece is that of Pausanias, x. 19 sq. His narrative has so many poetical touches, and so many curious repetitions of Herodotus's stories about the Persian invasion, that though he mentions no authority, we must ascribe these either to a contemporary poem or an epical narrative written while the events were still quite fresh in men's minds. This unknown work, by an unknown author, may qualify what I have said

in the text, but the total oblivion of it till the days of Pausanias really establishes my point. So the Celtic guards of Apollodorus may have been represented as the actual torturers of men in Lycophron's Casandreans; but we are told that his main adviser in the arts of tyranny was a certain Calliphon, who had learned them at the Sicilian courts. Hence it was clearly the Greek tyrant that Lycophron painted. How well recognised Hellenistic royalty must then have been is proved by this choice of tyrannous royalty as a subject suitable for an Alexandrian court poet.

CHAPTER IX

ALEXANDRIA AND ITS RIVALS

It is usual, when undertaking to speak of Alexandria, to begin with eulogies of the genius of its great founder, who is supposed to have divined with prophetic insight the one spot in the world pre-eminently suited for a great city. It is often supposed that he intended it for his capital, and yet we can hardly say that he could have had any definite views where the capital should be of an empire not then determined, but certainly intended in his dreams to include far more than the known world. It may have been his momentary view to have his provisional capital in Egypt ; but as his Eastern conquests increased he must have felt that Babylon was a better centre ; and had his soldiers not compelled him to stay his course we can well imagine him again changing his views when he came in sight of fabulous splendour and vast myriads of people in the regions of the Ganges and the Brahmaputra. Moreover he founded some sixty or seventy other cities, some of which remain to this day, and yet none of them have had the marvellous success of the Egyptian Alexandria, though all were no doubt founded with the same insight. The Greeks had founded the town of Naucratis, centuries before, at the Canopic mouth of the Nile, not many miles from the site of the new city, and though the position of Naucratis was for world purposes practically as good as that of Alexandria, it never attained any peculiar splendour.

If, therefore, the greatness of Alexandria were indeed due to the genius of its founder, it was not because of his inspiration as to its site, but because he had the power to insist upon its importance in Egypt, of which he made it the capital, and because his rapid conquests opened up vast new fields for commerce by the extending of Greek control into the East. The real cause, however, of Alexandria's superiority over its commercial rivals was not its site, but its good fortune in obtaining from the first a monarch of the ability, the energy, and the wisdom of Ptolemy Soter.¹ Though associated from the beginning with all the vast schemes and enterprises of Alexander, Ptolemy was the only one of the Diadochi whom we find keeping his mental balance and the measure of his power amid a society of men maddened with ambition and distraught with the dream of succeeding to the empire of the world. He was the only one who saw from the beginning that Egypt was an easily separable and thoroughly defensible province, of such size and resources as to make it in able hands an important kingdom.

Thus while all his rivals, first Perdikkas, then Antigonus, then Demetrius, and lastly Seleucus, spent their talents and lost their lives in striving to rule the world, he determined to make Egypt his secure dominion, and then extend his power as far as circumstances might permit, but rather by policy and influence than by regular campaigns and systematic conquest. Cyprus and Cyrene he acquired in this way, but ruled them not as a part of his personal kingdom. He placed in them princes of his family as satraps or governors. Palestine and Syria he was really anxious to conquer, and made several attempts to do so—political as well as military. But Egypt seemed as difficult to extend as it was easy to defend. Twice in his life, at the first moment of his establishment (B.C. 322), and again at the zenith of Antigonos's power (B.C. 306), he was obliged to resist great invasions. But the failure and death of Perdikkas, his first assailant, and the complete defeat of Antigonos, showed that Ptolemy was practically inexpugnable. For in addition to the natural defences of his country, which were of the strongest kind, he had permanently conciliated by his policy not only the Jews, his next neighbours on land, who always assisted him and thwarted his enemies in the direction of Syria, but also the Rhodians, whose maritime influence could neutralise any attack upon him by sea. Instead of trying to conquer this mercantile state, which he might easily have done by destroying its commerce, he had the large wisdom to support and befriend it, and so to obtain an influence in Greek waters which made him well-nigh master of the Ægean.

¹ His title Soter was given him by the Rhodians, owing to his help in their great siege by Demetrius. He was earlier known as Ptolemy, son of Lagus, and hence his dynasty is usually called that of the Lagidæ. In Egyptian inscriptions his parentage is usually concealed (or he is called Ptolemy, son of Ptolemy), and there was a current suspicion, perhaps fostered by his descendants, that he was the son of Philip II.

Such was the external policy of this remarkable man, who, while his rivals were wasting themselves in internecine struggles, was consolidating his empire and developing the commercial resources of his admirable position. The advantage he gained by maintaining peace and promoting industry during a whole generation spent by the Hellenistic world in profligate and ruinous wars, gave Alexandria a start which the other new capitals were never able to recover. Antioch came nearest, and ultimately asserted its place as a great capital of like importance in the East ; Lysimacheia, had the genius of Lysimachus been equal to that of Ptolemy, and had his time been as long, might also have become a great trading city. But the empire of Lysimachus, for a while so powerful, passed away, and its place was taken by Pergamum, which had neither the command of a great thoroughfare nor the support of a great territory. Macedonia had neither the position nor the genius for commerce. So Alexandria, under the sway of its satrap king, with his reasonable and consistent policy, rapidly became the first of Hellenistic capitals.

It had been, as it were, created for a commercial site, communicating with the sea by its two harbours pointing N.E. and S.W., so that sailing ships could make the port in almost any wind, and find a safe anchorage. Through Lake Mareotis, to the south, to which it was joined by a canal, it communicated with the mouths of the Nile, and so with the upper country. Its climate was then, as it is now, considered temperate, a constant northerly sea-breeze moderating the fierce heat of the Egyptian summer.¹ Strabo further remarks that in any other (southern) climate towns built on the shores of lakes were unhealthy, as the lower summer level left swampy surfaces uncovered, which breed fever. In Alexandria, on the other hand, there was no such danger, because the rising of the Nile in summer kept the lake at a high level. This remark applies to all Egypt, and is perhaps the chief cause of its eternal importance and wealth. Waterways are even now, in the days of railroads, far cheaper and more serviceable for heavy traffic than any land transport. They were more eminently so in the days when sailing ships had only caravans to contend with ; all the wealth of the Mediterranean and Euxine coasts could be deposited at Alexandria directly by shipping ; so could the precious luxuries of Nubia and inner Africa, by descending the Nile ; the riches of Arabia and of India were brought up the Red Sea, on whose shores several towns were established to secure them from Arabian pirates ; while the old canal of Pharaoh-Necho was reopened into the Nile, that so Indian ships could bring, without once unloading, their gold and ivory, their apes and peacocks, to Alexandria.

¹ Cf. Strabo xvii. 7. This prevalence of northerly winds may have been the real reason why the second port, which faced S.W., was called εὐνοστός, or the harbour from which return was easy ; to beat out of the great harbour against a north wind, through dense shipping, must always have been difficult. The legend asserted that it was named after a companion of Alexander.

These natural advantages, great as they were, would have lain comparatively idle in the hands of either the actual conquerors or the conquered, for the Macedonians show no genius for trade, and the Egyptians had long occupied the very spot without discovering its immense capabilities. Though the agricultural and industrial resources of Egypt were enormous, foreign trading was never congenial to them. But Ptolemy, and indeed Alexander at the foundation of the city, made good this deficiency by importing great settlements of the two nations which, above all others, have shown trading instincts through their long history—the Greeks and the Jews. Whether it was their ingrained instinct or the training of centuries—for each of them was placed on one of the great thoroughfares of ancient commerce, that of Asia Minor with the West and that of Egypt with Mesopotamia—these nations were certain then, as now, to turn every possibility of commerce to their own advantage ; and we know that they soon outweighed and outnumbered both the dominant Macedonians and subject Egyptians in the vast conglomerate of nationalities which made up that peculiar people, the Alexandrians. We know from ample authority that these latter were marked by features distinguishing them from the rest of Egypt, where Greeks and natives lived beside one another, but distinct in language and even to some extent in law, and thus more widely apart than are the Greeks and Albanians in modern Greece.

But if the commercial site of Alexandria was brilliant, we cannot say much for its natural beauty. Sandhills and a tideless sea, without wooding, without cliffs, with no mountains or islands in sight—what could be more dreary to those who had been accustomed to the enchanting sites of the Greek and Asiatic coast towns? We know that the Greeks of classical days said little about the picturesque, and seldom described it. Nevertheless its unconscious effect upon poetry and other forms of art is clearly discernible, and perhaps not a little of the unpicturesqueness of Alexandrian culture is due to the absence of this vague yet powerful influence. The grandeur of solemn mountains, the mystery of deep forests, the sweet homeliness of babbling rivers, the scent of deep meadows and fragrant shrubs, all this was familiar even to the city people of Hellenic days. For their towns were small, and all surrounded by the greatest natural beauty. But the din and dust of the new capital, reaching over an extent as great as modern Paris, were only relieved within by a few town-parks or gymnasia, and without by fashionable bathing suburbs, with the luxuries of city life replacing the sweets of nature; and if there was retirement and leisure within the university, it was eminently the retirement among books—the natural home for pedants and grammarians. How much this city life weighed upon the spirits of men is proved not only by the general dryness and dulness of the literature it produced, but still more by the great popularity of the poet of pastoral life, who delighted the jaded senses of his literary friends by a return into the simplest, if not the purest, country life ; and who rejoiced the pedants by putting them into pastoral dress, to feed their flocks on uplands of wide view, or lie idle in the rich grass, or sit by a fountain 'and sport with Amaryllis in the shade.' It has been generally recognised that the success of the late after-growth of genuine Greek poetry was due to this strong and declared contrast, but perhaps the dulling effect of the actual surroundings at Alexandria has not been equally appreciated.

So much has recently been discovered about the condition of Egypt in the days immediately preceding the conquest of Alexander, and it is so interesting to watch the gradual opening up of that ancient kingdom to Greek culture, that we may be allowed to digress briefly on so important and so little known a chapter of ancient history.

As is well known from Herodotus,¹ whose authority waxes as we approach the days of Greek traditions in the country, Psammetichus I. was the king who established himself on the throne with the aid of Greek mercenaries, and who kept them about him and in special camps, the 'War Camps' on opposite banks, at one of the mouths (Pelusiac) of the Nile. Herodotus tells us that any reliable knowledge whatever of Egypt among his countrymen dated from the accession of this King Psammetichus.

The mercenaries, however, gained admission to the interior, as we know from the very archaic inscription they have left us on the leg of a colossal statue at Abu Simbel. This inscription, which probably dates from about 650 B.C., and not later in any case than 590 B.C., is indisputable evidence. The practice of keeping foreign guards lasted on, and was confirmed by the succeeding kings of Egypt, to the growing disgust and hatred of the native military caste. It was soon seen that if the Greeks were allowed to usurp this service, the dignity and importance of the Egyptian troops were gone. So, Herodotus tells us, 240,000 of them made up their minds at once to emigrate to Æthiopia, in spite of King Psammetichus's entreaties, and carried their strength and culture to a rival state. He seems, however, to have managed some accommodation with the rest, for during both his own long reign and that of Psammis (Psammetichus II.) we hear of no disturbance. Possibly foreign wars occupied public attention. But the quarrel was not healed, and only required circumstances to renew it. Twenty-five years after Pharaoh-Hophra (Apries) came to the throne, he sent his Egyptian forces on a very arduous and unsuccessful expedition to Cyrene, whereupon they revolted, being persuaded that he had despatched them without proper commissariat, to perish in the wilderness which separates Egypt from the fruitful Cyrene. He sent his own brother-in-law, a high officer at court, to bring them back to allegiance, but no sooner had the latter reached the camp than he was proclaimed king by the insurgent army, which he led against his sovran. This pretender, the famous Amasis, thus made himself the champion of the national troops against the Greek mercenaries, and in the great battle that ensued he conquered and defeated Apries, who was so confident of victory that he took no precautions for retreat, and fell into the hands of his rival, who, after some delay, put him to death.

¹ See the very interesting chapters about this matter in the second book of Herodotus, viz. 152-154 and 178-180.

Here, then, was a victory which promised the restoration of the old state of things, and the prompt expulsion of the foreign troops from Egypt. What must have been the disgust of the national party when they found that, far from social matters as had never yet sat on Far from submitting to the elaborate quette which the priests described to him of the old Egyptian court, in which the tence of governing, was really the slave tions and the figure-head of a vast state Amasis was so secular a person as to pression that he was a mere upstart of low habits, who delighted in violating all the

The racy anecdotes of Herodotus on this curiously supplemented by a demotic papyrus scribes the king's fondness for the wine of

It was in the days of King Amasis. The high officers, I wish to drink some Kelebi [apparently a strong harsh wine made in the said to him, Great master, it is a hard Kelebi of Egypt. He said to them, Don't They answered, Great master, the desire accomplished. The king said, Let the wine the lake (Mareotis). They did according
The king purified himself with his sons.
before them but Kelebi of Egypt. It appe the king and his sons. He drank, while on deal of this wine, because of the love he Egypt. The king slept at night was allowed to go and speak to him. The officers went to him in a body and said, Our great master, the king's barge has reached its destination. The king said, I want to amuse myself.

And so they sought him a young sailor, to tell him a tale, which is unfortunately torn away.¹

But his innovations were far more than social. Not content with having confirmed the foreigners in their position, and thus sanctioned the degradation of the military caste, he brought up his Greek soldiers from the 'War Camps' at the Pelusiac mouth of the Nile, and established them in three great fortified garrisons, at Memphis, Heliopolis and Bubastis, endowing them, moreover, with the richest 'Church lands' belonging to these cities. He permitted a Greek mart—Naucratis—to be established for Greek traders, and even then their trading relations were strictly confined to Naucratis,² any foreigner landing elsewhere, except from proved stress of weather, being liable to be put to death. Herodotus further mentions the various Græco-Asiatic cities which contributed to the common temple—the Hellenion—in which the traders worshipped at Naucratis. The Carian and Ionian mercenaries, says Herodotus, he established as his guards against the Egyptians.

This was not all. There was in Egypt a supreme court of justice, consisting of thirty members elected from the sacred colleges of Thebes, Memphis, and Heliopolis, to whose decision all disputes with the crown seem to have been legally subject; in fact, the divine character of the monarch was in some strange way, by precedent or oath, understood or framed as a constitutional monarchy. To king often overrode the ancient law of the country. Thus the priests under Amasis gave up a large part of their proper remonstrance to keeping an accurate king took from them, as well as a reverence for the laws and regularities of the levities and irregularities.¹

¹ Cf. Rev. Egypt. i. 66.

² As the Chinese used to permit English traders at Shanghai only, in the stricter days of the Celestial Empire.

In spite of all these violations of law, Cambyses maintained himself on the throne for many years, and died in peace and prosperity before any one could attack him. The furious Persian went to his father's tomb, and insult the memories of his father as we know not only from Herodotus but from the condition of their sarcophagi. The dynasty of the king who hoped to get rid of the mercenary policy of the king, found the king's tomb filled with scorpions,' and their religion insulted by the Persian conqueror. Yet he did not reinstate the priests in their power, and we know that he did not expel the Persians from Egypt. On the contrary, in the reign of Cambyses, we find them on both sides of the Nile.

¹ From the extant document regarding the

in the fighting, often no doubt betraying their employers, but always profiting at the cost of the old population. So generally recognised was this predominance of Greek mercenaries that the native military caste silently disappears from Egyptian history, and under the Ptolemies we hear neither of landed property nor of other privileges belonging to this once famous order.

Curious demotic documents are now being deciphered containing the complaints of the old Egyptian party concerning these things. Amasis had been, though not the author, the main promoter of this denationalisation of the army; he had gone so far as to give the foreigners landed property; he had even done worse, for he had said, 'Let them bring their gods.' Now every ruler depends on them for support. 'They are people that accumulate vain promises, their heart is of brass, they have established their gods without obeying the voice of justice. Their belly stands to them in place of a heart. Their gods have prompted them to waste with fire Upper and Lower Egypt. Death is in their train. They will never be driven out.'¹

Darius seems to have organised Egypt not on the old national basis, but as a satrapy ruled by a Persian noble, and, above all, he seems to have based his taxation on the model of Amasis. If anything was taken from the Greeks, it was not given back to the priests, but turned into royal domain. And so during the various revolts of the natives down to its bloody reconquest by Ochus (about 350 B.C.) we have constantly patriotic chiefs, or relations of the old royal family, appealing to the old national sentiment, and carrying on long and chequered contests with their Persian oppressors.²

¹ Rev. Egypt. i. 82, note.

² See the reference to one of these insurgent nationalists against Xerxes, viz. Chabbas, in the curious document printed below, p. 177.

It was here that both Athenians and Spartans sent armies to assist the Egyptian against the Persian, and so even the national party were obliged to use the old two-edged weapon, and depend on strangers, who, if successful, were certain to demand a share of the country.

But in spite of many reverses, the priests, or established Church of the country, though impoverished, were strong and united enough to keep up the national feeling and much of the old social life of Egypt. They were a great corporation, with which all the Ptolemies were specially concerned, and which represented all the national interests of the aborigines against those of the foreign population. In the upper and more secluded parts of Egypt we know that manners and customs were but little changed. The contracts of marriage or business which come from Thebes show quite a different tone from those of Memphis, now the more fashionable capital, which had been influenced by trade and foreign residents.¹ The days came when even this city became old-fashioned and deserted in comparison with Alexandria, the third and last capital of that strange country in olden times.

I will only mention briefly here a few of the most notable social features disclosed by the demotic papyri, and deciphered within the last three or four years. On the economic conditions of the country they are very full indeed and direct. But they also throw some light on the general character of Egyptian society.

By a curious chance the family papers of two houses of respectability, one at Thebes and one at Memphis, have been recovered among the demotic papyri now in the museums of Europe. We have the wills, marriage settlements, mortgages, and other transfers of landed and house property carried on for generations by these two families; we can tell which of them was saving and increased his means; which of them was a spendthrift; above all, we find in these documents precious corroboration of those peculiarities which struck all foreign observers, from Herodotus onwards, as so salient in Egyptian life. M. Revillout has spent years of ingenuity and labour in discovering and fitting together chronologically these papers, which are in London, Dublin, Paris, Turin, and elsewhere; and it is to him, as I willingly repeat, that our new knowledge on these subjects is almost wholly due.

¹ There must have been a day when the reverse was the case. For Memphis, the capital of the ancient Empire of Menes, was displaced by the splendours of the Theban dynasties of the Ramessids. But this happened some 1500 years earlier.

The first and largest peculiarity in these legal documents is one which certainly dated from old times, inasmuch as it was opposed to the sentiment alike of Greeks, Persians, and Jews. This was the legal independence and freedom of women. Even a married woman makes contracts in her own name, holds property, and does all legal acts without reference to her husband. In fact, a married pair may each contract separately, and they often do so. Monogamy is distinctly the rule, though not enforced by criminal law, for a constant condition in marriage settlements is this: 'If I (the husband) shall turn aside to any other woman, or shall declare any other woman my wife, then I shall surrender' this or that, or repay dowry, or submit to various pecuniary penalties. Nay, further, so supreme is the position of women that we even have a man settling all his property, present and prospective, on his wife, with this only condition on her part, that she will support him while he lives, and give him a decent funeral and sepulture when he dies! Could anything be a more curious illustration of the passages in Sophocles and Herodotus,¹ where the Greeks jeered at the customs of Egypt, the men following female employments, and even what others thought female habits, while the women performed the graver duties of the other sex. To the Greeks such manners would appear absurd. As soon as they settled in the country, still more after the conquest by Alexander, they felt that they must have separate laws and separate magistrates, for to them a woman was no legal person, but an infant represented by her κύριος or lord—be he father, brother, husband, or, in default of these, her son or next of kin. Indeed, the time came, but not till Ptolemy Philopator, when a rescript (πρόσταγμα) of the king required the consent of the husband to all the legal acts of the wife. So then, especially in the remoter country parts, and in decayed cities like Thebes, when the life of fashion had moved down, with the politics, seaward, the old Egyptian life went on, and the Theban ladies could boast that they possessed a very different social status and a very different liberty from the ladies of their conquerors.

There are many other points on which we feel that Egyptian life was a thing apart, which was not easy to reconcile with Hellenic manners. The Egyptians were not, indeed, without humour and frolic, and the jocose Amasis had many counterparts in all ages there, as we know from the scenes of revelry depicted on the monuments, where even grand ladies appear disgracefully drunk. We even hear that the tax on ζύθος, an intoxicating liquor made from grain, and corresponding to our beer, was one of the main revenues of the government. And yet there is a deliberation/and solemnity about their art and their business, a circumstance about all their acts, which marks them as a peculiar people. The rule of a priestly caste was distinctly a cause of this, and also a consequence of their solemn temper, which would not else have tolerated the endless ceremonies, the complicated titles on documents, the sixteen witnesses to every legal act, the cumbrous and expensive ritual with which these priests fixed and kept their influence over the people. The Ptolemies found no other way of securing the allegiance of the people to new arrangements, to new claims of divinity, to new procedure in law, than to assemble the priests in solemn conclave,—or, rather, to persuade and bribe them at their annual solemn visit to court, so that, assembling presently at a synod or œcumenical council, they might proclaim the will of the king as the voice of the ruling caste. Two such public declarations are preserved to us in the famous inscription of Tanis, and the still more famous and better known inscription of Rosetta. To these we shall return in due time.

¹ Soph. O. C. vv. 337 sq.; Herod. ii. 35. The former passage is probably borrowed either from Herodotus's work or from his conversation. Cf. my History of Greek Literature, ii. 19.

It was either a stroke of genius, or a rare piece of fortune, that the new Hellenistic capital was founded far away from the great centres of sacerdotal, and therefore of strictly Egyptian life. It tended to withdraw from Memphis, Thebes, and such other ancient sites, the foreign population which was always distasteful to the natives; and at Alexandria the Greeks had only found the obscure and unimportant town of Rakotis, whose poor and ignoble population could easily be amalgamated in some way with the new settlers, yet even then by allowing them a separate quarter.

Nothing will give the reader so clear a perception of the inner contrasts between Greek and Egyptian life as to lay before him the actual text of the earliest declaration of

... King the gods who gave him the Horus of gold, lord in the whole and Lower Egypt, the lord of b the heart of Amon, chosen by the Alexander the ever-living, the frien
Pe and Teφ. He being as king in t Holiness was in the interior of A great viceroy in Egypt, Ptolemy w of youthful vigour was he, strong in spirit, mighty among the people, o foot, resisting the furious, not turni adversaries in the face in the midst had seized the bow, it was not [for] o was a [mere] play with his sword ; i not a question of staying beside him is no parrying his hand, no return of his mouth, there is not his like in t
He had brought back the images Asia ; all the furniture of the book north and south Egypt, he had r place. He had made his Residence loving Amon's name the chosen of Sun, Alexandria it is called on the

of the Ionians, Rakotis was its former name. He had assembled Ionians many, and their cavalry and their ships many with their crews, when he went with his people to the land of the Syrians, who were at war with him. He penetrated into their land, his courage was mighty as that of the hawk among little birds. He taking them at once carried their princes, their cavalry, their ships, their works of art all to Egypt. After this, when he had set out for the territory of Marmarica (Cyrene), he laying hold of them at one time, led captive their men, women, horses, in requital for what they had done to Egypt. When he returned to Egypt, his heart being glad at what he had done, he celebrated a good day, and this great viceroy was seeking the best [thing to do] for the gods of Upper and Lower Egypt. There spoke to him he that was at his side, and the elders of the land of Lower Egypt, the sea-land, the land of Buto is its name, it had been granted by the king, the image of Tanen, chosen by Ptah, the son of the Sun, Chabbas living for ever, to the gods of Pe and Tep. After his Holiness [Chabbas] was gone to Pe Tep to examine all the sea-land in their territory, to go into the interior of the marshes, to examine every arm of the Nile which goes into the great sea, to keep off the fleet of Asia from Egypt.

‘Then spoke his Holiness [Ptolemy] to him who was at his side: This sea-land let me get to know it. They spoke before his Holiness: This sea-land, it is called the land of Buto, is the property of the gods of Pe Tep from earlier time. The enemy Xerxes reversed it, not had he given anything of his to the gods of Pe Tep. His Holiness spake that there should be brought before him the priests and magistrates of Pe Tep. They brought them to him in haste. There spoke his Holiness: Let me learn to know the souls of the gods of Pe Tep, as to what they did to the king of Upper Egypt, the king of Egypt, the avenger of his father, the beginning of the gods hereafter, not out the miscreant Xerxes with his e self known in the town of Neith, S the holy mother. There spoke his H god among the gods there is not a may be given [me to know him] in th

I swear by it. There spake the pries of Pe Tep, that your Holiness may may be granted the sea-land, the lan to the gods of Pe Tep, with bread, good things, that there may be re your name on account of his loan to requital for the excellence of your viceroy spake: Let a decree be draw seal of the writing of the king's sc Ptolemy, the Satrap, the land of Bu the avenger of his father, the lord of lady of Pe Tep, from this day forth villages, all its towns, all its inhabitar waters, all its oxen, all its birds, all it produced in it aforetime, together wit

the downs. In the east the home of Sebennys, so that its calves may be [a supply] for the great hawks, its bulls for the countenance of Nebtanit, its oxen for the living hawks, its milk for the august child, its fowl for him in Sa, to whom is life—all things produced on its soil on the table of Horus himself, the lord of Pe and Buto the head of Ra-Harmachis for ever. This land in extension had been given by the king, the lord of both lands, the image of Taven, chosen by Ptah, the son of the Sun, Chabbas living for ever, renewed them has this great viceroy of Egypt, Ptolemy, gifts to the gods of Pe Tep for ever. As reward for this that he has done, may there be given him victory and strength to his heart's content, so that fear of him may continue even as it is among strange nations. Whosoever shall propose the land of Buto, so that he shall touch it to take ought from it, may he be under the ban of those that are in Pe, under the curse of those that are in Tep, so that he may be in the fiery breath of goddess Aptari in the day of her terrors, not his son, not his daughter, may they give him water.'

This curious document, the earliest we have from the Ptolemaic times, shows us clearly the character of Soter's policy. He as yet had assumed no royal style (316 B.C.), but was nominally regent or satrap—the latter word is transcribed into hieroglyphics—for the young Alexander, but he holds absolute sway;¹ he brings back from Babylon, probably as a means of ingratiating himself with his new subjects, the spoils taken by Cambyses and Ochus from the temples. He carries on successful wars in Syria, and also in the direction of Cyrene (Marmarica), and makes

¹ An inscription (hieroglyphic) at the sanctuary of the large temple at Luxor tells us that it was rebuilt by the young Alexander, son of the great, which, of course, means that it was rebuilt by this Ptolemy during the boy's nominal reign.

on national principles against the P an alliance with the priesthood of th induce it by the bribe of large privi against the foreigners. Ptolemy So self popular by the same means, thou careful watch over his finances, an priests to regain their former dispr in the country. Nor was the cou enough to demand that a Greek vers be appended, as in later inscription the Greeks must have been at first sin late such a style as that of the above see the old formalism of the Egyptia titles displayed as it has never been perhaps in the proclamations of th while these latter asserted titular countries, which might or might i them, the titles of the kings of Egypt identifying them with the ever-livi remember this when we see how of the new dynasty was accepted the neglect or dislike of apotheosis
the people more, and seemed indee

seems as if Egyptian life and art had been too long fixed in stereotype to admit of any real fusion with another and a different race. What may have been the case in Alexandria is not yet to be judged from any material remains, for old Alexandria is still under the sands, and awaits her Mariette or her Schliemann. It is, however, pretty certain that here Egyptian influences were weak, the Egyptian population was only of the lower classes, and therefore the city was (till the seventh Ptolemy) Hellenistic in the sense that Antioch, Apamea, or Nicæa were. We may hope soon to learn something on this point concerning Ptolemais in Upper Egypt, a city founded by the Lagidæ, not far from Thebes, and certainly more foreign than any inland town on the Nile. But as regards all the rest, we see from the great collection in the museum of Boulaq, that the early Ptolemies were unable to produce any fusion of races. There is, indeed, one statue in that museum which is really Græco-Egyptian—a Greek ideal face with Egyptian pose and dress. It is supposed by M. Maspero to represent Alexander III., the hapless son of the great Alexander, on evidence which seems to me insufficient. But, at all events, it dates from the early days of the Lagidæ.¹ Later on we have plenty of works done by the orders of these kings ; we have their portraits in relief upon the walls of the temples they raised to Egyptian gods and with Egyptian ritual ; and with the exception of one or two rare figures in so-called Greek dress, every figure, every sculpture, every temple, is purely and completely Egyptian.

¹ M. Maspero, in giving us a picture of this statue (Archéologie égyptienne, p. 229), notices two or three more, but of later date, and perhaps even of Roman time. He believes that in the end Greek art asserted its supremacy upon Alexandrian native artists, and that further excavations will yet prove it. But how slow and hesitating was this growth !

tion and the permission of much in the hands of fools or villains de the vulgarest tyranny. Great care the susceptibilities of the various into the country by its new rulers Egyptians, and Greeks were more magistrates, and judged by their o all these lesser magistrates were in subordinate to heads of departments administrators, and all absolutely to t country there were a few Greek tow Greek law, and beside them the Egypt to abide by their old customs, but also magistrates and be judged by them But many of the Greeks seem even among the Egyptians without local Egyptian towns. We only know of P and of Arsinoe, in the Fayoum, as dis

It was evidently the intention or t to Hellenise gradually the obstinately people in Egypt. We do not hear of ments, or of any body of Macedonians must assume them to have been a small hereditary military aristocracy, rather distinguished by high commands than purity of blood, and forming the household brigade and personal staff of the kings. These, too, were allowed their ancient right of assembling as a body of free soldiers, and passing decrees of life or death; they formally at least proclaimed their recognition of a new king,¹ but the king had no idea of allowing them to usurp his powers—in other words, it was a copy of the state of things in Alexander's army.

In Alexandria itself the various races were for a generation at least very distinct—the Macedonians and all other royal officials living in the quarter called the Bruchium, the Egyptians in the old part of the town, Rakotis, which adjoined the peninsula on which modern Alexandria is built. We do not know that Jews or Greeks were positively excluded from these quarters, but no doubt the great majority resided in the remaining districts, three in number, whose names are lost, but which lay about the great thoroughfares crossing at right angles, and about the south side facing Lake Mareotis. The favours extended by Alexander and the first Ptolemy to the Jews² induced a great number to settle there, perhaps so many as to form one-fifth of the population. They intended, too, from the first to make their stay permanent; they learned Greek and adapted themselves to Hellenistic culture. For the translation of their Law, Prophets, and Hagiographa into Greek began almost immediately after their settlement, or as we may infer from a distinct allusion to the Song of Solomon as early as Theocritus.³ Not content with the tame prose version of the LXX., perhaps even independently of it, or as an experiment, certain Jews gave passages from their earlier history in more classical Hellenic form. We learn from Clemens of Alexandria¹ and from Eusebius² that one Hezekiel brought out The Exodus as a Greek drama, a Philo wrote an epic poem on Jerusalem, a Theodotus another on the ancient history of Sichem (Samaria). The fragment cited by Clemens from The Exodus is a respectably written iambic passage on the early life of Moses, which is paraphrased closely from the book of Genesis.

¹ Polybius, xv. 32.

² Whether these favours amounted to full citizenship is a doubtful point, to be discussed in a later chapter.

³ Cf. this point discussed in my Hist. of Gk. Lit. i. 417, note.

The fable which has given the Greek Old Testament the title of the LXX. may be laid aside; German critics find considerable differences in the quality of the translation of various books, and it requires no such fabulous interest to give importance to the book which is not only our earliest and often best authority for the real text, but the longest, and for this period the only book in Hellenistic prose which has come down to us. Polybius gives us the current dialect of the next century, and rather that of Greece and Asia Minor than of Egypt. The LXX. tells us what kind of Greek arose in the great new centre of Hellenism, which showed the results of Alexander's conquests and the fusion of races earlier than any other city, and which must have given the model in many respects to all the rest.

This Greek of the LXX. has given great trouble to the learned, for its growth out of previous dialects is not at all clear. It is not debased Attic; it has no infusion of Macedonian or of Egyptian; Hebraisms may fairly be set down to the influence of the original text which the venerable translators closely followed. But the result is something so different from the Greek of Demosthenes or even of his immediate successors, of Menander and the New Comedy, as to fill us with astonishment. The language of the philosophers, of Aristotle, and still more of Epicurus, has lost indeed almost all Attic grace, and yet it is quite different from the clumsy, odd idiom of the LXX. The translators lived, too, among learned men who wrote commentaries on Attic diction, who composed poems with studied elegance, and thought themselves great masters of style. It is evident that the language 'understood of the people' at Alexandria knew nothing of these subtleties. It was a practical idiom without a history. Comparing it with the varieties in our tongue, it was not like 'Pigeon English,' for it was far better, and used in literature; on the other hand, it was not like spoken American English, or Irish English, for both these varieties represent for the most part survivals of old English, such as it was when first imported by settlers to America and to Ireland. There is, I believe, no trace whatever of antiquity in the dialect of Alexandria.

¹ Strom. i. 414 sq.

² Prep. ix. 20, 22, 24, 37.

A great number of Egyptians must have learned this dialect, for as it was by no means the policy of the Lagidæ to exclude them from all civil or military service, so Greek was always insisted on as the official language¹ except in private contracts, and most certainly no one could hold command in the army without speaking Greek. I have shown that the military caste of old Egypt was completely gone in Alexander's time, and there is no mention of it under the ¹ This official dialect has been preserved to us in many bilingual inscriptions, and is distinguishable both from the spoken idiom of Alexandria, the clumsy attempts at style in the LXX. and the literary Greek of the Museum. It has been well compared to mediæval Latin, both in its involved and long-winded sentences, and its conventional coinages of words. It occupied the same kind of place among the people of Egypt that Latin held in law courts and churches in the Middle Ages.

...and, like a Chinese peasant is not in the army, and seeing by experience Italy means, so it was doubtless by of those days was taught some smattering and manners, and some respect for made his country so rich and splendid.

If, however, the military caste Ptolemy no trouble, the priestly caste formidable, either as an ally or as an shows his wisdom more clearly than case. He had learned from Alexander tolerance ; indeed Greeks and Macedonians untainted with the sectarian severities even of the Persians, whose contacts perhaps account for their religious exclusiveness.
had found in the priestly caste of Egypt
the English have found in the Catholics and had proceeded against them as politicians proceeded in Ireland, by coercions. Hence the advent of Alexander priests as a delivery from bondage.
indeed fail, as we have seen above, to ments of the Egyptian priesthood :

fixed revenue, by building and restoring great temples, by offering great gifts at their altars, and by general respect and attention to the established religion, they revived the alliance of church and state, which is so necessary to every absolute monarchy.

But beyond these court favours there was something more to be done ; if the kingdom was to possess an established religion, it could not be wholly Egyptian. The Macedonians, so far as we know, worshipped the same gods as the Greeks, but the Greeks, freethinkers as many of them were, must have their religious susceptibilities respected. This was done, in addition, of course, to the erection of local Greek shrines, by the famous importation of Zeus Hades from Sinope, and his formal identification with Sarapis. There was something peculiarly suitable in choosing this god ; for there was at Babylon a temple to a god so called by the Macedonians, and the worship of the Syrian Adonis is said to have been akin. At all events, as all these nations worshipped a god of the dead, there was no difficulty in the identification. We should not forget the strong pantheistic current which had set in throughout Greece, and which finds expression in the then nascent Stoic system. From this aspect the gods of all nations, and the various gods of each cult, were only temporary or local manifestations of the universal One—the substance and spirit of the universe. Such views had from the earliest times been manifest enough in Egyptian literature, as may be seen from many extant hymns.¹ Let me add that as men's notions of the Divine government of the world are always a reflex of their actual experiences, or the ideal of their age, as to human government, so the Greek world, ¹ See the discussion of the subject, with quotations from Egyptian texts, in my Prolegom. to Ancient History, pp. 262 sqq.

come to introduce the Eleusinian m and the Egyptian priests, such as Ma difficulty in identifying whatever G dream of Ptolemy suggested with t deity.

The whole story, as told by Tacitus to a secret discussion among the v
the king's direction, and a delibera and wonders to establish the am completely did religion enter into t Lagidæ! Accordingly we find the p publish their sanction of divine hon monarchs, and this in Greek as well as with a document of this kind—a priestly a Ptolemy (IV.) and a Cleopatra, that C to break the seven seals which hid Egy our search, so that to the Lagidæ and to this inestimable benefit. How compl themselves with the hieratic art of the proved by the now vanished temple at third Ptolemy, with a long account in of his wonderful conquests in the far Ea

The finances of Egypt under the Pto-

said by all our remaining authorities to have been in a most flourishing state. Though the population of Egypt can hardly ever have reached 8,000,000—a very high estimate—we know that the land was extraordinarily fruitful, and that the inhabitants submitted without open complaint to very high taxation. But even this cannot account for the enormous sums alleged to have been stored in the treasury, the great armies kept on foot, and the gigantic court expenses. The cost of one great feast given at Alexandria was nearly half a million of our money, and if it be true that an army of 100,000—our authorities say over 200,000 men—was kept on foot, with ample commissariat appointments, as well as a large fleet, it is evident that this, together with the expenses of a very luxurious court, must have produced an enormous yearly budget. After the destruction of Tyre by Alexander, and the settling of so many Jews in Egypt, the whole course of Eastern trade must have been turned into Egyptian channels. All the preciousnesses of India and Persia came up the Red Sea, and through Alexandria into the Mediterranean. So did the treasures of inner Africa,—ivory, ostrich feathers, wild beasts,—all the curiosities which are prized in a luxurious and ostentatious age.

It is remarked by the historians that the financial policy of the Lagidæ was no better than that of other military despotisms, and, like the Germans of the present day, they thought it necessary for their security to store up hoards of precious metals, away from use and profit, against the eventuality of war. But in spite of this very Persian proceeding, it seems clear that Egypt was not only solvent, but very rich, so long as it was ruled by able monarchs. Thus, with its comparatively small territory and its unwarlike population, it remained for a century more than a match for the immense empire of the Seleucidæ, and for the martial state of Macedonia under the Antigonids. It was only when a series of infants and debauchees succeeded to the throne, that these rois fainçants got into financial and military difficulties.

The fact was that though Macedonia possessed a quality of soldiers far superior to its rivals, the boundaries of its power were ill defined; it was perpetually subject to barbarian invasion from the north and Greek revolts in the south, while its very extended coast-line laid it open to the attacks of its naval enemies, notably of Egypt. The Seleucid kingdom, afterwards known as that of Syria, commanded a vast population, or series of populations, some of them indeed warlike, but most of them mere orientals in the received sense, so that not only were their vast armies likely to fall into the condition of the hosts of the last Darius, but revolts of whole nations were frequent, and difficult to subdue. Thus a small and compact kingdom, unassailable except in outlying provinces, such as Cyprus and Cyrene, and ruling over a homogeneous population, or mixture of populations so well fused that separate fractions or races could not easily revolt,¹ assumed and maintained the first position in the Eastern world.

If ever a result of such magnitude can be distinctly ascribed to the genius of an individual, it may safely be affirmed that without the clear views, the tenacious policy, and large sympathies of the first Ptolemy, the whole history of Egypt, and with it of Hellenism, would have been widely different, and yet all we know of him personally fails to corroborate these indirect but certain proofs of his genius. He was indeed an active and successful commander under Alexander, but among the staff of the great king he does not seem to have occupied the first place. Some were more popular, others more feared. Nay, if Arrian had not used Ptolemy's own account of his early campaigns, in which no doubt that general gave no carping or incomplete story of his own achievements, he might have seemed even less important. I do not remember that in any of the personal anecdotes about Alexander he ever figures prominently, perhaps because he was a very temperate man, and avoided the revelry which Alexander loved, and which must have worn out many strong constitutions besides that of the king.

¹ That such revolts were possible we shall see presently in the condition of Egypt, when the native population looked to a mahdi of that day as their deliverer against Ptolemy Philopator and his monstrous taxation. It was against this usurper that the king was proclaimed a god by the priests at Rosetta. Cf. Revillout in Rev. égypt. ii. 1 sq.

But there are men whose greatness only comes out in their life-work, who are no heroes to their valets or to anybody else around them, but make a permanent figure in history. The greatness of these men, which consists in discerning and directing all the greatness about them, comes tardily to be acknowledged. Thus we had in our own day Victor Emanuel, who grew from a petty prince of Savoy into King of Italy, by slow and almost natural steps, and by utilising all sorts and conditions of men—Cavours, Mazzinis, Napolcons, Garibaldis, Popes. They came and went, they helped, died, or revolted, but still his policy held its course. Such a man may Ptolemy have been. And just as silly people still have the stock-word in their mouths that Cavour, who died in 1861, made Italy, or in other words lived and advised till 1879, so there are still historians who tell us that Alexander, by founding a great city, foresaw and pre-arranged the complicated struggles and debates which Ptolemy fought and solved by his patient and stubborn purpose.

But in all that has so far been said in this chapter the reader will have noticed, perhaps with impatience, the omission of far the best known claim of Ptolemy and of his capital to historic fame—I mean the foundation of the Museum or University of Alexandria, with its magnificent library and scientific appointments. It was convenient to dispose of other questions before approaching this, which will naturally lead to a new subject—the literature of the Greek world in the first half of the third century B.C.

The idea of making Alexandria a centre, not only of commerce but of letters, seems to have matured gradually in the mind of the king. So late indeed in his life was this step taken that many have ascribed it to his son, and called Philadelphus the founder of the museum. But though our scanty texts are clear enough in stating this, the date of the foundation is nearly determined, years before the reign of Philadelphus, by the call of the philosopher Demetrius (Phalereus) to Egypt, when he helped the king's idea to take shape by his experience of the academies of Athens. The very name museum, which is still in Germany applied to literary clubs, points to an Attic origin. We have already explained (p. 145) how a nominal religious cult gave security to the property of each school, and how each society of the kind at Athens gradually became an independent corporation, endowed by the founder and by his disciples. The state stood aloof, except at a few stray moments, when it interfered to repress or persecute. It was clearly out of the question for the military bureaucracy of Egypt to tolerate a powerful intellectual force of this kind beyond government control and patronage. Hence from the first the endowment of the new museum was a state allowance, given directly by the king to each member. But for what?

Ptolemy was by no means interested in the spread of any special doctrine; he probably knew little, and cared less, about the differences of the Athenian schools. What he wanted was to have celebrated men thinking and writing at Alexandria, and he left it at first to the superior judgment of Demetrius, and perhaps to his own son, the crown prince, what the complexion of the school—if such we can call it—should be. It seems, therefore, that the king and his minister of education founded an institution more like an old college at Oxford or Cambridge than anything else of the kind. It was a foundation supported by the king, and adjoining the royal buildings, in which there was a Commons Hall, courts, cloisters, and gardens, where dwelt men selected for their literary and scientific eminence. They were under a provost or principal, who was a priest, and who was nominated by the king, but whose religious services in the college were apparently confined to the formal cult of the Muses, a feature borrowed from the Academy at Athens. It may serve to show the contrast of spirit between the republican academies of Athens and the Royal University of Alexandria, that the priest of the Muses, who had the charge of the religious services of the Peripatetic Academy, and was for the time president in the Commons' Hall, was elected by the members for thirty days, on the last of which he gave an entertainment, partly by subscription and partly at his own cost. The ecclesiastical head of the Museum was nominated by the king, apparently for no short or fixed period, but no doubt during royal pleasure. If this provost was also the high priest of Sarapis, we come to something like the days when an archbishop could control one of our colleges. It is certain that he was not an Egyptian. We hear the names of no Egyptians mentioned as members of the Museum, and the Egyptian reaction upon Greek and Jewish philosophy which arose by and by certainly did not work through the Museum. This College, on the contrary, like our own ancient colleges, was rather a home of critical research and of erudition than of new ideas and of the advancement of knowledge. Its provost was probably no more important intellectually than the heads of houses are now at our universities. The endowed fellows were no doubt men of learning, still more men of critical habit, and sometimes great men of science. But they seem rather to have taught accurately what was known than to have ventured into new paths in philosophy or religion.

It is moreover tolerably certain that teaching and tutorial work were not among the early conditions of their appointment, just as in the foundation of old Oxford colleges there was sometimes a provision that the fellows should not be required to spend their energy in teaching, but should devote it to their own studies.¹ Yet, just as at Oxford this admirable provision gradually went out of fashion, and was discarded for the lower view of making the colleges advanced boarding-schools, so at Alexandria young men naturally gathered about the Museum, and the Fellows of that college were gradually persuaded to undertake tutorial or professorial work. And this too determined more clearly than ever their function to be that of promoting erudition and not knowledge. In pure mathematics, starting from Euclid, in medicine and allied researches, in natural history, we may make exception, and say that the University of Alexandria did original work; but, on the whole, we can conceive thinking men in later classical days saying what they now say of our richly-endowed colleges—that the outcome has not been worth the cost.

The Museum of Alexandria can certainly vindicate

¹ This is so, for example, in the foundation of Queen's College, and appears in the modern history of All Souls, Oxford.

itself before the world. Apart from the scientific side, which requires special knowledge to discuss, and for which I therefore refer to Mr. Gow's History of Greek Mathematics, the Fellows of the Museum, when brought together into a society by the intercourse of the second Ptolemy, whom many authors, following the tradition of Alexandrian flattery, call the founder, developed that critical spirit which sifted the wheat from the chaff in Greek literature, and preserved for us the great masterpieces in carefully edited texts.

This leads us to the second great literary foundation of Ptolemy, the Library, which with us is regarded as the appendage of an university, but at Alexandria was so novel and important as to eclipse the Museum. We never hear who the ecclesiastical provost of the college was. We are told, even in our scanty records, most carefully who were the chief librarians, and what they contributed to the perfection of their library. But we must imagine Europe with only one library, that of the British Museum, with learned men flocking from all parts to study by its side, if we will realise the enormous inducement offered by Ptolemy to the world of scholars. For centuries to come men journeyed to Alexandria for this purpose, and in spite of tyrants and conflagrations it remained the centre of the world for erudition and for bibliography. But it was for erudition that the inducement was so great; to philosophers not of the encyclopædic school it was far less valuable, and we find that many celebrated men refused the nomination of Ptolemy. They were offered an additional inducement, that of being put on the foundation, and so living at the king's expense, but this was a weak point as well as a strong one in the Museum. Ptolemy would not make it an independent corporation, appointing its own fellows, but always a lection of learning on every subject made it like a royal road to solve the secrets of nature.

So the great Museum became the nucleus. Ptolemy wished to found colleges. There were houses founded at Alexandria, one for the Emperor Claudius, with the condition that all his works should be read through there publicly. So the Jews had a school there, and the Greeks—all separate centres for study.

It seems therefore quite legitimate to compare the condition of things with the old English universities and colleges. Foreign scholars writing about the East speak of these colleges, and therefore the strike them. But though there were many points of difference—notably the very questionable advantage of the Museum being situated in a great capital, the adjunct to a royal palace, directly supported by annual royal gifts—the likeness is too strong to be evaded, and makes the history of this establishment of the deepest interest to English students.

¹ This is still the weak point of most European universities, even reintroduced into England after the late Prince of Wales introduced bureaucratic Teutonism into play in England. The same may be said of his foundations, especially that of the Queen's College, Oxford, attributed to this establishment of state interference in education. Of view, indeed, Athens was more like Oxford or Cambridge than of the curious analogies I have cited from Alexandria. The University of Alexandria was altogether one vast complex of grounds, holding a position similar to that held by Trinity College in the heart of Dublin, whereas we hear from travellers that the first places to visit at Athens were the philosophical schools—separate foundations in different

So it came to pass that Ptolemy Soter gathered into his capital every kind of splendour. He had secured for it the most important monument of its kind in the world—the tomb of the great Alexander,¹ which commanded the veneration of centuries, down to the debased age of Caracalla. He established the most brilliant palace and court, with festivals which were the wonder of the world. He gathered all that he could command of learning and literary fame. And the city was adequate by the largeness and splendour of its external appearance. We have it described in later times as astonishing the beholder not only with its vastness—to wander through its streets, says Achilles Tatius, is an ἐνδημος ἀποδημία, taking a tour without leaving home—but with the splendour of the colonnades which lined the streets for miles,² and kept the ways cool for passengers;

¹ Pausanias says expressly (i. 6, § 3; 7, § 1) that Ptolemy Soter entombed Alexander at Memphis, and that it was Philadelphus who brought the body to the Sema at Alexandria. If this be true, which I gravely doubt, there can hardly be a question that Soter intended to do it, and that he was delayed by untoward circumstances from completing his purpose.

² The colonnades were a distinct feature of Hellenistic cities, notably Alexandria and Antioch, in the latter of which it is especially described. The modern reader who desires to feel the effect of this will find it in the city of Bologna, where most of the streets are built in this way. The result is a great development of echoes, which sound very strangely through the quiet hours. This peculiar sound must be appreciated to understand Polybius's famous narrative of the riot at Alexandria (xv. 25 sq.), and seems to me also implied in Apollonius Rhodius's description of night (iii. 749), οὐδὲ κυνῶν ὑλακὴ ἐτ' ἀνὰ πτόλιν, οὐ θρόος ἦεν ἡχήεις.

their streets so well lighted that the autumn
the sun did not set, but was distributed ἡλίου κατακερματίζων—to illumine the palaces and other royal buildings and pa like the palace at Peking, and had their shore, but all the rest of the town l and ship traffic in all directions. E language must have been met in its stre had its fashionable suburbs too, and its
the east, Canopus, Eleusis, and Nicopoli Necropolis. But of all this splendour r left¹ us in detail what we are reduced to in

¹ It did not enter into Strabo's plan to give me account of Alexandria, and he has done it badly e tion scene in Polybius (xv. 25), to which we shall far more living and suggestive.

CHAPTER X

THE ALEXANDRIA OF PHILADELPHUS, ANTIOCH, ETC.

THE advent of Philadelphus to the throne was hailed by all Egypt, as well as by Greeks and Macedonians, as the advent of the right successor to carry out the great policy inaugurated by the soldier of fortune. The eldest prince, Keraunus, was disinherited, and went to the north to justify the old king's rejection of him by his violences and murders, and after strange successes to die in the battle as King of Macedonia. It was quite in keeping with the cautious clearness of the old man's policy to appoint his successor, and see him governing, before he died; nor did he make any reserve in giving away his kingdom, but took his place as a subject in the young king's household.

This Philadelphus, then, succeeded at the age of twenty-four, and remained for nearly forty years the most brilliant monarch in the world. The balance of the external evidence we possess is in favour of his being the actual founder of the Museum, and even if we reject this account as internally improbable, he was evidently from early youth so fond a patron of it, and so interested in its success, that all the literary men lauded him as the maker of Egypt's intellectual greatness. We can certainly show no really eminent names the library had been so marvellously enriched. Alexandria had become so secure and pleasant, that wits were ready to flock to his court. The Menander wrote their plays at Alexandria—Machon and Apollodorus Carystius, who were the leading scientific men collected their studies with the aid of the botanic collections, as well as of all the wisdom books; and the art of bibliography and of connection with the library. These, with the elements of poetry, to which we shall return, mark the epoch at Alexandria, and from this time has been justly called Alexandrian; for no work of Greeks who had made Alexandria home, but the new character of all things stamped upon it by the circumstances of the tastes of its royal patron.

He seems to have inaugurated his reign with a festival which surpassed all that had been hitherto known of in the world. The description of it by Athenæus¹ from the work of Callixenus on the subject is positively tedious in its splendour, in its length.

help to supplement what we shall gather presently from the contemporary literature.

The first thing that strikes us is the ostentation of the whole affair, and how prominently costly materials were displayed. A great part of the royal treasure at all courts in those days consisted not of coin but of precious gold and silver vessels, and it seems as if all these were carried in the procession by regiments of richly dressed people. And although so much plate was in the streets there was a great sideboard in the banqueting hall covered with vessels of gold studded with gems. People had not, indeed, sunk so low in artistic feeling as to carry pots full of gold and silver coin, which was done in the triumph of Paullus Æmilius at Rome, but still a great part of the display was essentially the ostentation of wealth. How different must have been a Panathenaic festival in the days of Pericles! I notice further that sculpture and painting of the best kind—the paintings of Sicyonian artists are specially named—were used for the mere purpose of decoration. Thus in describing the appearance of the great chamber¹ specially built for the banquet, Callixenus tells us that on the pilasters round the hall were one hundred marble reliefs by the first artists, in the spaces between them were paintings, and about them precious hangings with embroideries representing mythical subjects or portraits of kings. We feel ourselves in a sort of glorified Holborn Restaurant, where the resources of art are lavished on the walls of an eating-room. In addition to scarlet and purple, gold and silver, and skins of various wild beasts upon the walls, the pillars of the room represented palm-trees and Bacchic Thyrsi alternately, a design which distinctly points to

¹ He calls it σκηνή, but it was all of marble, gold, and other solid materials.

Egyptian rather than Greek taste. The whole floor, we are told, was strewn with all manner of flowers, like a celestial garden, and then follows this interesting detail: 'For Egypt, on account of its good climate, and the care of those who grow what is rare and in blow at special seasons elsewhere, has flowers in abundance all the year, and neither rose nor white lily nor any flower is wont to fail them at any time.' This festival was held in winter, and yet there was abundance of fresh grapes to afford a vintage scene on one of the great vehicles of the procession, where sixty satyrs trod the wine-press to the sound of the flute and song, with Silenus superintending, and the streets were flooded with the foaming must.

Among other wonders the Royal Zoological Gardens seem to have been put under requisition, and we have a list of the various strange animals which joined in the parade. This is very interesting, as showing us what could be done in the way of transporting wild beasts, and how far that traffic had reached. There were 24 huge lions—the epithet points no doubt to the African or maned lion—26 snow-white Indian oxen, 8 Æthiopic oxen, 14 leopards, 16 panthers, 4 lynxes, 3 'young panthers,' a great white bear, a camelopard, and an Æthiopic rhinoceros. The tiger and the hippopotamus seem to have missed this opportunity of showing themselves, for they are not mentioned. There were besides 24 chariots drawn by elephants, 14 by various antelopes, 60 by goats, 8 by wild asses. There were droves of camels bearing all the spices of Arabia-Felix; Nubians bearing 600 ivory tusks and 2000 stems of ebony, with endless gold dust (not coin) in gold and silver vessels. Then came 150 men bearing shrubs peopled with all manner of birds, and besides, in cages, peacocks, pheasants, guinea-fowls, and the like. Among them were 2 hunters, with 2400 dogs of Indian, Molossian, Hyrcanian, and other breeds. This zoological exhibition was, however, artistically introduced in that part of the show which represented the victorious return of the god Dionysus from his Indian conquests—a splendid gold and ivory figure attended by crowds of Sileni and satyrs with ivy and pine cones, carrying home all this spoil, and among it Indian and other foreign women, under tents in chariots in the guise of captives. It reminds us of the triumphal progress of Alexander after he had escaped the deserts of Gedrosia.

But this great Bacchic show was only one of a large number of mummeries or allegories which paraded the streets;¹ for example, Alexander attended by Nike and Athene; the first Ptolemy escorted and crowned by the Greek cities of Asia Minor, and with Corinth standing beside him. Both gods and kings were there in statues of gold and ivory, and for the most part escorted by living attendants—a curious incongruity all through the show. But to represent either a god or a king by a living actor was perhaps thought even then unseemly. There came, however, in the beginning of the procession, an allegorical representation of the Year, given by a very tall man dressed in tragic costume and mask, with a golden horn of Amalthea in his hand. He was accompanied by an equally splendid female figure, surnamed the Five-year Feast, escorted by four Seasons carrying their fruits. There were attendant satyrs, and after them Philiscus the priest of Dionysus, and all the Company of the Tragic Theatre. This was what we should call legitimate or living mummary.

¹ The fashion of allegory in art is shown in a remarkable work of this time, already mentioned above, the Calumny of Apelles, in which he suggested his own history. Here is Lucian's account:—'Apelles, in commemoration of the dangers he had incurred, revenged himself upon Calumny by a picture of the following character. On the right sat a man with enormous ears, just like those of Midas, stretching out his hand to Calumny approaching him from a distance. About him stood two women—Ignorance, I suppose, and Suspicion—and from the left side Calumny is arriving, a very handsome female, but heated and excited, as it were exhibiting frenzy and rage, with a burning torch in her left, with the other dragging by the hair a young man stretching out his hands to heaven and appealing to the gods. A male figure leads the way, pale and unsightly, peering sharply, and like those who are reduced by a long sickness. You could guess it to be Envy. Two women follow in attendance on Calumny, setting her off and adorning her. As the cicerone told me, one of them was Conspiracy and the other Deceit. But behind them followed some one in deep grief, with black garb and dishevelled hair, I think she was called Repentance, and she was turning back in tears to look with great shame on Truth, who was approaching.'—Overbeck, Schriftquellen, No. 1874.

I have only cited a few scraps of this long and curious passage, to show what was thought taste and splendour in the Alexandria of Philadelphus. The procession lasted the whole day, being opened by a figure of the Morning Star, and closed by Hesperus. 80,000 troops, cavalry and infantry, in splendid uniforms, marched past. The whole cost of the feast was over half a million of our money. But the gold crowns offered by friendly towns and people to the first Ptolemy and his queen had amounted alone to that sum.

These extravagances might lead us to suppose we had before us another Sardanapalus. We hear, also from Athenæus, of his many and famous mistresses, who were enumerated by one of his successors (Euergetes II.) in his memoirs. These women, of whom Athenæus mentions five, were some of them Egyptian, some Greek, but apparently common people, flute girls or dancers. One of them, Cleino, who served him with wine as his Hebe, was known all over Alexandria in statues representing her in a single under-garment with a pitcher in her hand. She was probably some beggar maid that this other Cophetua saw drawing water when she took his royal fancy.

There is much perplexity among historians why this king should have divorced his first wife, the daughter of Lysimachus, to marry her stepmother, also named Arsinoe, his own full sister, the widow first of Lysimachus, and then of Ptolemy Keraunus, who murdered her children, after she and he had murdered her stepson Agathocles. She was nearly forty years of age, a vigorous and unscrupulous politician, and owning, at least in theory, several towns on the Propontis and in Greece. It is supposed by Droysen that Philadelphus married her for the sake of this important dowry. I rather fancy he was led into this violation of all except Egyptian propriety because he knew he would find in her an able helper in his complicated and difficult diplomacy with the states on the Propontis and Black Sea, and because she was likely to leave him free to enjoy his amours without jealousy. It is likely enough that she interfered a great deal in public affairs, and that to her is due much of the character which the king gained for astuteness.

All his wars seem carried on by playing off one enemy against another, or by raising up diversions in the rear of an assailant, or by timely cession of points not worth disputing. For all the world was embraced in his view. He alone of the Hellenistic kings of that day had direct relations with both Romans and Carthaginians, and watched with keen interest the fortunes of the first Punic war. It was, indeed, quite clear that in this war friendly neutrality was his proper policy. Some eight or nine years before, just after the return of Pyrrhus from Italy, Philadelphus had sent an embassy offering friendship and alliance to Rome. His proposal was received with the greatest eagerness by the Romans, and three of the noblest senators were sent to Alexandria to ratify it. They were entertained in the splendid style of the Alexandrian court, and no doubt the massive gold gifts which they brought home must have awakened in younger Romans a longing to demand some share in the riches of the East. But for the present the profits of the treaty fell to Egypt. Probably it was now that Puteoli was established as the free or privileged port of Egyptian trade, for here Alexandrian ships resorted ever after throughout Roman history. We can imagine what prices upstart Roman luxury paid for oriental refinements, and how advantageous to Alexandria must have been the supply of timber and wool which the Egyptians brought from Italy. At the same time, the Egyptian king took care not to break with the Carthaginians, who were indeed his most dangerous rivals in both western and southern commerce, and of still more importance on account of their influence on the coast of Syria—his most anxious frontier. But when they asked him for a loan of 2000 talents during the first Punic war, he politely declined on the ground that it would be helping friends against friends.

If we add to these considerations the expeditions and foundations of cities undertaken in the South, in Arabia, Æthiopia, and even Central Africa, we shall get some notion of the cosmopolitan character of the civilisation of those days. Hellenistic culture, it cannot be too often repeated, was so far like modern European culture that all those partaking it had, or claimed to have, a certain superior type; and the countries on the boundaries, such as Meroc, Bactria, the Tauric Chersonese, were constantly striving to establish this claim.

To narrate in detail the diplomatic struggles of Egypt with Macedonia and Syria would be to write the history of the times, which is not my task. The general character of these relations has already been indicated. Ptolemy held his own against Antigonus Gonatas by befriending the Greeks with counsel and money, sometimes by sending his fleet into Greek waters. He likewise weakened Antiochus (both Soter and Theos) by his interference on the coasts of Asia Minor, and his support of the Asiatic Greek cities. His enemies, on the other hand, constantly endeavoured to set up Cyrene against him, to defeat his fleet, or to attack him by land in Syria and Palestine.

We cannot but infer from what is left us of evidence, that this Ptolemy had in him an element of weakness, especially on the military side. He was too fond of pleasure and of curious research to be a great man of action. Apart from his lower amusements he loved to dispute with the dons of the museum, to send out expeditions for rare plants and animals into far Africa or Arabia, to dispense splendid hospitality at his palace.¹ It is an index of the rapidly altering taste of that day, of the love for the new, as compared with the veneration for the old, that no king of Egypt was content with the palace of his predecessor, but built himself a new one beside it. Thus Strabo found a whole series of these palaces in the Royal Quarter, just as many modern capitals show the same extravagant folly. We are not surprised to hear that the king was a martyr to the gout, and that when he saw the fellahs lying asleep in the sun, or eating with appetite their frugal meals as they lay, he exclaimed with sadness: 'Alas me! why was I not born one of these!'

¹ The picture given (from pseudo-Aristeas) by Josephus (Ant. xii. 2, 7, 10) agrees fully with all that we have said, and represents the king neglecting state affairs, and spending his time in the workshops of the gold and silver smiths, watching their work, and superintending the designs of the offerings which he made to the temple at Jerusalem. The source of Aristeas's information is not known; but this sketch of the king has all the appearance of being authentic. We find in Philadelphus a figure strangely like the princes of the Renaissance, especially those in Italy, who combined virtues, vices, and love of the arts so marvellously.

But if it be true that he sought eagerly after the elixir of life, and hoped to find immortality by the aid of Egyptian magic and the occult lore of the priests, we have here another proof of the weakness of this prince, whom his circumstances had made so splendid, and whom a whole generation of literary men lauded to the skies. There is this, too, about him, which reminds us of the vulgar oriental despot, that immediately after his accession he put to death or exiled most of his immediate family. How different from the history of his contemporary Antigonos, or of the Attalids, who were so famous for brotherly affection! So I feel that, with all its splendour, the Alexandria of Philadelphus represents socially a worse court and worse morals than the cities of Hellenic antecedents.

We will devote a separate chapter to the literary men and their work, but we may here remark that their separation from the populace was in all respects complete. The populace were walled out from the Royal Quarter (Bruchium), with its palaces and parks, its officials and its savants. They were pampered with largesses and shows, and kept in good humour by royal bounties; but at the same time they were sternly controlled by a large military force, and allowed no voice in serious affairs.¹ So they became under weaker sovereigns that dangerous, fickle, cruel mob so graphically pictured by Polybius in the next century. Let us now survey briefly the condition of the other states in the Hellenistic world—the kingdom of Antiochus, that of Antigonos, and the Greek states and cities which preserved the name of independence with very little of its reality.

¹ I cannot find any mention of native Egyptians employed about the Ptolemaic courts till we come to the seventh king (Euergetes II.), who, during his struggles with his brother for the sovereignty, entrusted an Egyptian, Ptolemy Sympetesis, with the control of Cyrene.—Polyb. xxxi. 27.

The empire of the Seleucidæ, and the characters of its kings, though perhaps of greater interest and importance in the world than those of Egypt, are far less known. Though the court of Antioch appears at some time to have founded both a museum and a library, we hear hardly anything of them. No literature that we know of arose under the Seleucids, if we except the important translation by Berosus, the Chaldæan high priest, of the annals of his country from the cuneiform records, which was dedicated to the first Antiochus. It was analogous, and no doubt in relation, to the translation of hieroglyphic records for the second Ptolemy, by Manetho. Yet there are hints that Antiochus honoured and loved letters, and kept literary men about his court.¹ Concerning his personal character, however, after his romantic marriage (p. 69), and indeed concerning that of all his successors till we come to Antiochus the Great and Antiochus Epiphanes, we know absolutely nothing. The external frame of his life is full enough. We hear about his wars and alliances with Ptolemy, with Antigonus, with the Celts of Galatia, and with the several second-rate powers in the north of Asia Minor. He had succeeded to a stormy heritage, and found it impossible to hold together so vast and heterogeneous a dominion against able and warlike neighbours.

The kingdom of Syria, as it is called, but more properly the kingdom of the Seleucidæ, was an ill-defined and ever-changing complex of nations, reaching, according to the genius of its actual ruler, from the Ægean to the Indus, or from the Cilician passes to the bounds of Mesopotamia. Antiochus had no uniform nationality, like the Egyptian, as a solid stock whereon to graft his Greek officials and mercenary soldiers, but swayed many various peoples, in all stages of development as to politics and manners. Hence the whole organisation of his kingdom is looser, his cities have larger local privileges, his provinces semi-independent rulers. They make their own laws, furnish distinct contingents of troops, and live rather under the Persian than the Macedonian form of supremacy.

¹ Aratus of Soli is said to have attracted his attention by Hymns to Pan, and to have been summoned to his court.

And yet not only was the court framed exactly after the model shown by Alexander, and a new capital made for the new kingdom, but there is evidence that Syria became the peculiar home of Hellenism to a degree that was never attained in Egypt. In Egypt Alexandria stood almost alone, and in the lapse of years Egyptian influences made themselves prominent even there. For the Egyptian type was tough and lasting beyond parallel in history. All through inner Syria, on the contrary, we find towns, rivers and mountains renamed after Macedonian memories ; we must therefore assume that a large proportion of Macedonians settled in this country, and so the influence of Syrian Hellenism was deeper and lasted longer than that of Alexandria. Juvenal says it was the Syrian Orontes which flowed into the Tiber, and ultimately Antioch became a greater social and commercial centre than Alexandria.¹ It shows clearly the Hellenistic views of Seleucus that he founded a new capital here, instead of adopting either Babylon or Seleucia on the Tigris as his residence. He saw that not only were his dangerous enemies in the West, but that here also was the social centre of gravity, and that all the great commerce which enriched his treasury must have a secure outlet to the Mediterranean.

¹ If the LXX. represents to us the Greek of Alexandria, strangely enough the New Testament gives us our only large example of Syrian Greek.

Antioch therefore was founded as a rival to Alexandria, and competed with Alexandria in carrying the caravan trade of the East into the Mediterranean. The port town, Seleucia (on the Orontes), was carefully fortified and replaced the old marts of Tyre and Sidon on that coast. There was yet another distinct line of traffic developed by the Seleucids, and altogether in their hands—that from China across the Hindu-Kush to the sea of Aral and the Caspian, and so by the Black Sea into the Greek world. The silk of the Seres seems long to have followed this route, and this must also have been the case with the rare furs which were as much prized then as they are now. The country south of the Caspian, Hyrcania, was well known as of marvellous fertility, and the rise and importance of the kingdom of Pontus, in a region now obscure and forgotten, shows what wealth was developed there by the trade of the Hellenistic world.

But when we come to inquire into the social life of these many outlying members of the Greek world, there is deep silence. In later days we have sketches from Polybius, later still from Dion Chrysostom, but in this century there is no city known to us outside Greece proper, except Alexandria. There are still wars and rumours of wars; there are indications of trade and commerce, but of private life there is nothing. Inscriptions may yet supply us with some few details, but we can hardly hope to recover any real picture of the age. And yet how profoundly interesting would be such a picture! What should we not give for a view of Antioch in the days of its rising greatness, of Cilicia when it renewed with its hardy grafts the decaying tree of knowledge in Greece? We can see the reaction of Semitic creeds upon the vulgar, of Semitic seriousness upon the refined among the western nations. The worship of Astarte and Adonis came from Syria; so did the deepest theology of the Stoic system. But how, and through whom, and when—all this seems lost for ever.

We are a little better informed concerning the character and court of Antigonus, and the sort of life which men led in Macedonia and Greece. The external history of the time shows him to have been an earnest and devoted prince, wanting in the military genius of Pyrrhus and Demetrius, but far superior to them in character and endurance. The way in which he set to work, time after time, to reconstruct his kingdom, lost by defeat or shattered by invasion, is one of the most remarkable instances of stubborn determination in history. And though he was in the end rewarded by securing the kingdom of Macedonia to himself and to his heirs, he was all his life contending with but partial success against inferior men advocating inferior principles. There are many allusions in Diogenes Laertius which show him to have been a friend and pupil of the philosophers at Athens, especially of the Stoics, whose system was probably the creed of his life. He was no doubt convinced that a reasonable monarchy was the ideal form of government, but the coincidence of this principle with his interests makes it difficult for us to judge him clearly. It is hardly possible that all the tyrants whom he supported in the Greek cities were men whose conduct was strictly Stoical. And, moreover, how far his means of government were justified by the end in view, nay more, what that end really was, is not by any means certain.¹ If he

¹ The serious view of his character now taken by German historians should not blind us to the curious story of his capture of the Acrocorinthus, and his conduct on that occasion :—

Antigonus's passion for it was not less than that of love in its greatest madness ; and it was the chief object of his cares to find a method of taking it by surprise when the hopes of succeeding by open force failed. When Alexander, who was master of the citadel, died of poison, which is really intended to save the civilised world by means of a strong Macedonian barrier against another invasion of hideous barbarism, and for this required the general support of Greece, we may excuse him for preferring one submissive tyrant to a whole mass of turbulent pauper tyrants in each Greek city. But in any case it was very loose Stoicism to make the end justify the means. We know that the governors he appointed over Greek cities were temperate and worthy men. Persæus the Stoic, who commanded at Corinth, and lost his life there, is the most celebrated. So also we know that in this generation high-spirited and virtuous young men like Lydiades of Megalopolis made themselves tyrants of their native cities, acting upon the theory of all said to have been given him through Antigonus's means, his wife Nicæa, into whose hands it then fell, guarded it with great care. But Antigonus, hoping to gain it by means of his son Demetrius, sent him to make her an offer of his hand. It was a flattering prospect to a woman somewhat advanced in years, to have such a young prince for her husband. Accordingly Antigonus caught her by this bait. However, she did not give up the citadel, but guarded it with the same attention as before. Antigonus, pretending to take no notice, celebrated the marriage with sacrifices and shows, and spent whole days in feasting the people, as if his mind had been entirely taken up with mirth and pleasure. One day, when Amœbeus was to sing in the theatre, he conducted Nicæa in person on her way to the entertainment in a litter set out with royal ornaments. She was elated with the honour, and had not the least thought of what was to ensue. But when they came to the point which led towards the citadel, he ordered the men that bore the litter to proceed to the theatre; and bidding farewell to Amœbeus and the wedding, he walked up to the fort, much faster than could have been expected from a man of his years. Finding the gate barred, he knocked with his stick, and commanded the guard to open it. Surprised at the sight of him, they complied, and thus he became master of the place. He was not able to contain his joy on that occasion: he drank and revelled in the open streets and in the market-place, attended by flute-girls, and crowned with flowers. When we see a man of his age, who had experienced such changes of fortune, carouse and indulge his transports, embracing and saluting every one he meets, we must acknowledge that unexpected joy raises greater tumults in an unbalanced mind, and oversets it sooner than either fear or sorrow.

Antigonus having in this manner made himself master of the citadel, garrisoned it with men in whom he placed the greatest confidence, and made the philosopher Persæus governor.—Plut. Aratus, c. 17 (Langhorne).

the schools of philosophy, who seem to have agreed in their myriad tracts on monarchy (περὶ βασιλείας) that the rule of one man was the best form of government. We see the same spirit in the Spartan king Agis, and then in Cleomenes; we see the pale reflex of it in the theories which underlay the politics of the Gracchi, led by their Greek philosopher in after days.

But Antigonus, if he was indeed a Stoic, was still more a statesman. He opposed the calm calculations of policy to the chivalrous knight-errantry of such men as Pyrrhus, who said he was an impostor, wearing the purple instead of his philosopher's gown. He encouraged at his court serious poets like Aratus, whose extant Phænomena were composed in Macedonia.¹ He was surrounded not only by men of letters and philosophers, but by foreign politicians and soldiers; and if he did not order inquiries into the wonders of tropical nature, like Ptolemy Philadelphus, we may be sure he studied deeply the manners and ways of all the courts and cities within the civilised world. And this was the type of man created by Hellenism. We shall find it in the Attalids, we shall find it in Achæan leaders, and in the cosmopolitan air which the prose writers of that age affected.

But the people with whom Antigonus had chiefly to deal were not the easiest material for the development of these views. In the Macedonians he had indeed subjects differing widely from those of the King of Egypt, or from all those who were really subject to the court of Antioch.² Instead of sand-hills or desert or the lazy river carrying down its wealth amid tropical heats, through fields of golden wheat, we have in Macedonia alpine wilds, foaming torrents, forests of primeval timber, upland pastures with winter snows—the everlasting home of a free and bold race of mountaineers, given to war and the chase, and as shepherds despising the laborious tiller of the soil. All the splendour of their court never subdued a certain rudeness in these Macedonians; they never produced, that I can remember, a great man of letters. They seem to have acquiesced in the loss of some of their pristine liberties, and to have submitted to the tolerably absolute monarchy of their philosophic king. But then the position of Macedonia was that of a military outpost against barbarism; and among a nation of soldiers absolute obedience is easily transferred from the camp, where it is indispensable, to the homestead. Yet withal the Macedonian still went about through the Greek and Syrian world as the Englishman has been accustomed to go through Europe—the acknowledged superior in physique, and the citizen of a nation which had dominated the world.

¹ Alexander the Ætolian, the poet Antagoras of Rhodes, and the well-known Hieronymus of Cardia (in his old age) are also mentioned as living at his court.

² I except, of course, the mountaineers of Asia.

Macedonia never possessed what seems an essential feature of other Hellenistic kingdoms—a large and populous capital. The first condition for such a populous city is an extensive trade, and Macedonia was precluded from this by having no transit route of the ancient world within her natural boundaries. Byzantium or Corinth would doubtless have become cities of the first magnitude, had Macedonian kings held permanent court there. But even then Corinth must always suffer as a literary and art centre by the proximity of Athens, whose supremacy as an university town could never be shaken, while Byzantium would have been prevented from reaching the same kind of greatness by the rise of Pergamum. So the ancient kingdom of Macedon remained without any distinguished capital—Ægæ, the sentimental Residence, contained the tombs of her kings; Pella was made a court by Philip II.; but the mountaineers valued country life too dearly to gather into a town, and traders were few and despised.

If these people were patient and vigorous, though not very improving, subjects, the cities and tribes of Greece, which Antigonus was striving all his life to incorporate into his kingdom, were of a very different type. They were far too clever to submit to his theories—nay, they applied them for themselves, and drew conclusions opposed to his interests. Thus it seems that the Stoic philosophy which inspired the king also inspired the patriots of Athens, when they rose under Chremonides (circ. 265 B.C.), and struggled for the last time to assert their ancient liberties. Everybody who notices this war speaks of it as a noble and patriotic effort, but all these opinions rest upon the judgment of Niebuhr, who, as I have already said, was too personally concerned in this great question of politics to speak dispassionately.

Far more important, however, than the Chremonidean war, which Antigonus settled with moderation and kindness, was the discovery or new application of the idea of Federal Cities, which presently grew so strong under the influence of Aratus in the Peloponnesus. Here was a practical solution of the difficulty of uniting democracy and liberty at home with strength and security in foreign politics. It was eminently successful too, as Plutarch remarks, so long as the members of the confederacy were able to refrain from the fatal Greek vice of jealousy—jealousy of those attaining high positions by talent and wealth.¹ The history of this federal idea in Greece, and its various realisations, must be read in Professor Freeman's remarkable volume.

¹ Aratus, c. 9.

For politics, though entering everywhere into both social life and literature, is not the professed subject of this book.

If we want to form some notion of the life of the higher classes of that day in Peloponnesus, we must turn to Plutarch's Life of Aratus, probably the best of all his famous biographies. Being based on the memoirs of the Achæan leader, which were written down, he tells us, currente calamo, as a diary, this life is full of picturesque details which are hard to find in the artificial rhetoric of the day. But the acts of Aratus belong to a generation later than that which now occupies us, and there is some danger of attributing to nascent Hellenism the features it developed when well established. We shall therefore postpone our examination of the Greece of Aratus to a later chapter, and turn to the literature which burst forth brilliantly at Alexandria as soon as the second Ptolemy was established on his throne.

There was indeed everywhere an extraordinary burst of literary activity. Every philosopher or public teacher of that time—Zeno, Cleanthes, Metrodorus, Aristo, all the people whose lives Diogenes Laertius has given us, wrote scores, nay, hundreds of works, so many indeed that we must regard each of them as a mere tract, composed and circulated as men now circulate public speeches or lectures, especially of a polemical character. Chrysippus and Epicurus seem to have consciously aimed at a reputation for polygraphy. These works were preserved too, and catalogued, as may be seen from the long lists in Diogenes, who lived centuries later.¹

¹ Here is about a third part of the list of Chrysippus's works, which will suffice to show the reader what such a catalogue was:—'Ἐπεὶ δὲ ἐνδοξότατα βιβλία ἐστὶν αὐτῷ, ἔδοξέ μοι καὶ τὴν πρὸς εἶδος ἀναγραφὴν αὐτῶν ἐνταῦθα καταχωρῆσαι. Καὶ ἔστι τάδε. Λογικοῦ τόπου θέσεις, Λογικὰ καὶ τῶν τοῦ φιλοσόφου σκεμμάτων, Ὅρων διαλεκτικῶν πρὸς Μητρόδωρον, ζ'. Περὶ τῶν κατὰ τὴν διαλεκτικὴν ὀνομάτων πρὸς Ζήνωννα, α'. Τέχνη διαλεκτικὴ πρὸς

Together with this flood of special tracts, which now deluged the philosophic world, and which were written without regard to style, merely to express the views of a thinker, we have the historians of the day, who plumed themselves upon their diction and the ornaments of their narrative, and who, in contrast to the philosophers, wrote great encyclopædias of history in long series of books. Such were those who followed in the steps of Ephorus and Theopompus—Timæus, Philochorus, Duris, afterwards Phylarchus, and then Polybius, whose remains give us an idea of this kind of literature. Whether these works were

Ἀρισταγόραν, α'. Συνημμένων πιθανῶν, πρὸς Διοσκουρίδην, δ'. Λογικοῦ τόπου τοῦ περὶ τὰ πράγματα, σύνταξις πρώτη. Περὶ ἀξιωμάτων, α'. Περὶ τῶν οὐχ ἀπλῶν ἀξιωμάτων, α'. Περὶ τοῦ συμπεπλεγμένου, πρὸς Ἀθηνάδην, α', β'. Περὶ ἀποφαντικῶν πρὸς Ἀρισταγόραν, γ'. Περὶ τῶν καταγορευτικῶν, πρὸς Ἀθηνόδωρον, α'. Περὶ τῶν κατὰ στέρησιν λεγομένων, β'. Πρὸς Θέαρον, α'. Περὶ τῶν ἀρίστων ἀξιωμάτων πρὸς Δίωνα, α', β', γ'. Περὶ τῆς διαφορᾶς τῶν ἀορίστων, α', β', γ', δ'. Περὶ τῶν κατὰ χρόνους λεγομένων, α', β'. Περὶ συντελικῶν ἀξιωμάτων, β'. Σύνταξις δευτέρα. Περὶ ἀληθοῦς διεξευγμένου, πρὸς Γοργιππίδην, α'. Περὶ ἀληθοῦς συνημμένου, πρὸς Γοργιππίδην, α', β', γ', δ'. Διαίρεσις πρὸς Γοργιππίδην, α'. Πρὸς τὸ περὶ ἀκολουθῶν, α'. Περὶ τοῦ διὰ τριῶν, πάλιν πρὸς Γοργιππίδην, α'. Περὶ δυνατῶν, πρὸς Κλεῖτον, δ'. Πρὸς τὸ περὶ σημασιῶν Φίλωνος, α'. Περὶ τοῦ τίνα ἐστὶ τὰ ψευδῆ, α'. Σύνταξις τρίτη. Περὶ προσταγμάτων, β'. Περὶ ἐρωτήσεων, β'. Περὶ πεύσεως, δ'. Ἐπιτομὴ περὶ ἐρωτήσεως καὶ πεύσεως, α'. Ἐπιτομὴ περὶ ἀποκρίσεων α'. Ζητήσεως, β'. Περὶ ἀποκρίσεως, δ'. Σύνταξις τετάρτη. Περὶ τῶν κατηγορημάτων πρὸς Μητρόδωρον, ι'. Περὶ ὀρθῶν καὶ ὑπτίων πρὸς Φίλαρχον, α'. Περὶ τῶν συναμμάτων πρὸς Ἀπολλωνίδην, α'. Πρὸς Πάσυλον περὶ κατηγορημάτων, δ'. Σύνταξις πέμπτη. Περὶ τῶν πέντε πτώσεων, α'. Περὶ τῶν κατὰ τὸ ὑποκείμενον ὠρισμένων ἐκφορῶν, α'. Περὶ παρεμφάσεως πρὸς Στησαγόραν, β'. Περὶ τῶν προσηγορικῶν, β'. Λογικοῦ τόπου περὶ τὰς λέξεις καὶ τὸν κατ' αὐτὰς λόγον. Σύνταξις πρώτη. Περὶ τῶν ἐνικῶν καὶ πληθυντικῶν ἐκφορῶν, ε'. Περὶ λέξεων, πρὸς Σωσιγένην καὶ Ἀλέξανδρον, ε'. Περὶ τῆς κατὰ τὰς λέξεις ἀνωμαλίας πρὸς Δίωνα, δ'. Περὶ τῶν πρὸς τὰς φωνὰς σωρειτῶν λόγων, γ'. Περὶ σολοικισμῶν, α'. Περὶ σολοικιζόντων λόγων πρὸς Διονύσιον, α'. Λόγοι παρὰ τὰς συνηθείας, α'. Λέξεις πρὸς Διονύσιον, α'. Σύνταξις δευτέρα. Περὶ τῶν στοιχείων τοῦ λόγου καὶ τῶν λεγομένων, ε'. Περὶ τῆς συντάξεως τῶν λεγομένων, δ'. Περὶ τῆς συντάξεως καὶ στοιχείων τῶν λεγομένων intended as universal histories on a fixed plan, or merely as collections of antiquarian lore, they indicate the same desire as the controversial tracts of the philosophers—the desire of their authors to appear before the world as men of letters—the itch or mania of authorship. We have consequently clear evidence that this enormous body of lost literature laboured under the defects certain to accompany that well-known human vanity—self-consciousness in style, a morbid desire to appear original, and the habit of bitter criticism and of savage literary feuds. To be accused even once of plagiarism, especially when the accusation was true, rankled in the πρὸς Φίλιππον, γ'. Περὶ τῶν στοιχείων τοῦ λόγου πρὸς Νικίαν, α'. Περὶ τοῦ πρὸς ἕτερα λεγομένου, α'. Σύνταξις τρίτη. Πρὸς τοὺς μὴ διαιρουμένους, β'. Περὶ ἀμφιβολιῶν πρὸς Ἀπολλῶν, δ'. Περὶ τῶν τροπικῶν ἀμφιβολιῶν, α'. Περὶ συνημμένης τροπικῆς ἀμφιβολίας, β'. Πρὸς τὸ περὶ ἀμφιβολιῶν Πανθοίδου, β'. Περὶ τῆς εἰς τὰς ἀμφιβολίας εἰσαγωγῆς, ε'. Ἐπιτομή τῶν πρὸς Ἐπικράτην ἀμφιβολιῶν, α'. Συνημμένα πρὸς τὴν εἰσαγωγὴν τῶν εἰς τὰς ἀμφιβολίας, β'. Λογικοῦ τύπου, πρὸς τοὺς λόγους καὶ τοὺς τρόπους συντάξεις. Πρώτη, τέχνη λόγων καὶ τρόπων πρὸς Διοσκουρίδην, ε'. Περὶ τῶν λόγων, γ'. Περὶ τρόπων συστάσεως πρὸς Στῆσαγόραν, β'. Σύγκρισις τῶν τροπικῶν ἀξιωμαίων, α'. Περὶ ἀντιστρεφόντων λόγων καὶ συνημμένων, α'. Πρὸς Ἀγάθωνα, ἢ Περὶ τῶν ἐξῆς προβλημάτων, α'. Περὶ τοῦ τὰ συλλογιστικά τινος μετ' ἄλλου τε καὶ μετ' ἄλλων, α'. Περὶ τῶν ἐπιφορῶν πρὸς Ἀρισταγόραν, α'. Περὶ τοῦ τάττεσθαι τὸν αὐτὸν λόγον ἐν πλείοσι τρόποις, α'. Πρὸς τὰ ἀντειρημένα τῷ τὸν αὐτὸν λόγον ἐν συλλογιστικῷ καὶ ἀσυλλογίστῳ τετάχθαι τρόπῳ, β'. Πρὸς τὰ ἀντειρημένα ἐν ταῖς τῶν συλλογισμῶν ἀναλύσεσι, γ'. Πρὸς τὸ περὶ τρόπων, Φίλωνος, πρὸς Τιμόστρατον, α'. Λογικὰ συνημμένα, πρὸς Τιμοκράτην καὶ Φιλομαθῆ. Εἰς τὰ περὶ λόγων, καὶ περὶ τρόπων, α'. Σύνταξις δευτέρα. Περὶ τῶν περαινόντων λόγων, πρὸς Ζήνωννα, α'. Περὶ τῶν πρώτων καὶ ἀναποδείκτων συλλογισμῶν πρὸς Ζήνωννα, α'. Περὶ τῆς ἀναλύσεως τῶν συλλογισμῶν, α'. Περὶ τῶν παρελκόντων λόγων, πρὸς Πάσυλον, β'. Περὶ τῶν εἰς τοὺς σολοικισμοὺς θεωρημάτων, α'. Περὶ συλλογισμῶν εἰσαγωγικῶν, πρὸς Ζήνωννα, α'. Τῶν πρὸς εἰσαγωγὴν τρόπων, πρὸς Ζήνωννα, γ'. Περὶ τῶν κατὰ ψευδῆ σχήματα συλλογισμῶν, ε'. Λόγοι συλλογιστικοὶ κατὰ ἀνάλυσιν ἐν τοῖς ἀναποδείκτοις, α'. Τροπικὰ ζητήματα, πρὸς Ζήνωννα καὶ Φιλομαθῆ, α'. Τοῦτο δοκεῖ ψευδεπίγραφον. Σύνταξις τρίτη. Περὶ τῶν μεταπιπτόντων λόγων, πρὸς Ἀθηνάδην, α'. Ψευδεπίγραφον. Λόγοι μεταπίπτοντες πρὸς τὴν μεσότητα, γ'.—Diog. Laer. vii. 7, 13, §§ 190-195.

minds of these Greek professors as a lifelong disgrace, to be revenged by a series of attacks, both open and secret, upon the moral character, the veracity, the learning of the accuser. Thus we see a feature of our own learned world anticipated in this society.

But there is another main feature in which the difference between the two epochs is equally striking. When we see the enormous increase of short and cheap books under the Diadochi, we are led to think that literature must have been reaching the masses, that a lower class of people were beginning to read, and we might expect that in the ruder literary work we should find a flavour of real life, of daily wants and habits, as distinguished from the ideal loftiness of the golden age of Greek writing. We should imagine that some of these many authors wrote for the people. And yet so far as we can judge this was not the case, for a very distinct reason. It was not the increase of letters within a fixed area, embracing by degrees the lower and more ignorant population, but the spread of letters over an enormously extended area, wherein were found a vast number of people of some education and with some desire for knowledge, but without that unity of taste, that solidarity of public opinion which reacts upon authors by creating a definite standard of style. There is, I believe, no trace of literature for the masses, of an appeal to the common people, in all these books. They were written for the learned in Greek, for the higher classes who spoke Greek in the Hellenistic kingdoms of the East. To most of these people Greek was not their native tongue, and hence they never could become true judges of the really delicate features of that language. Even Aristotle had noted that you could always tell a foreigner, however fluently he spoke, by the use of the particles—an observation of which we, who endeavour to write Greek prose, can fully appreciate the force. So then this whole literature, appealing either to the serious thinkers in Greece who openly despised style, as having consumed the energies of generations of literary men before them, or else to the outside Hellenistic world, on whom this kind of refinement was thrown away, affords us no masterpieces save those of Theocritus, which perhaps owe their unique position to the loss of all the models which he used. But what in our eyes is far more serious, it echoes no voice of the people, no genuine national spirit, no intense love or hate on broad human grounds. It is the literature of academies, the poetry of literary cliques, the criticism of pedants, at best the cold thinking of pure men of science. Nor are the pastorals of Theocritus any real exception. More artificial in their day than any of the other forms of poetry, though fascinating for their novelty and their perfect art, these poems give us no more idea of the ordinary manners of the lower classes in Egypt, or in Sicily, where most of the scenes are laid, than the Comus or Lycidas of Milton do of the shepherd life of England in the seventeenth century.¹

Yet even so this literature is not the less an index of some part of the life of that self-conscious and critical age, and is so little known even to the better educated among Englishmen, that some account of it will be to most readers at least a novelty. Among the hundreds of men who make Greek their study at Oxford and Cambridge there are probably not twenty who possess a text of Apollonius Rhodius, not ten who possess Callimachus—and yet these were once thought the foremost men in a brilliant age, and are representative of an epoch in Greek literature.

¹ The famous sketch of the Alexandrian women in the fifteenth idyll was borrowed from Sophron of Syracuse, a far earlier author. Cf. my Hist. of Gk. Lit. ii. 170.

CHAPTER XI

THE LITERATURE OF ALEXANDRIA UN SECOND PTOLEMIE

*ἐν δὲ πλατισμῷ
πουλιμαθημοσύνης, τῆς οὐ κενεώτ*

It is usual to say that time has comple the famous books written by the Alex there are plenty of speculations as to the world is in consequence, or whet self-conscious, artificial, academic lit robbed us of a valuable compartment letters. I am not sure that a charge of true and well established, is fatal to tl work of art, unless that work delibera aim something absolutely inconsistent wi plays of Racine are in the highest ser are those of Alfieri, despite their affected both are great monuments of art.

the beauty of this world which touches and ennobles our lives is artificial beauty, or else natural beauty heightened by artifice ; and it is only when the artifice becomes apparent and attracts our attention that we complain of it, because it spoils our enjoyment. Thus in Greek literature I suppose there are no greater authors than Æschylus, Demosthenes, and, in the age before us, Theocritus, and yet all of them are highly artificial. They are all great enough to make the artifice subservient to deep and real human interests, and therefore they are not classed as artificial by the world of readers. Justly so too ; but let the closer student study any minute critic of their art, such as Westphal on Æschylus, Blass on Demosthenes, or Fritzsche on Theocritus, and he will see the truth of what I say. All the Latin poets of the golden age were highly artificial, and the greatest of them, Vergil, was perhaps the most artificial of all ; yet what poet has a sounder or a more widely recognised claim to greatness ?

The contrast so often insisted upon in recent times between classical and romantic seems indeed to imply in all its variations this idea, that classical art adheres consciously to forms and precedents recognised as superior to ordinary nature, and therefore as ideal, while romantic art professes to reproduce the untutored and unregulated effects of nature. There is in cultivated societies a perpetual oscillation as regards these two ways of affecting and improving æsthetic taste. There are times like that of Athenian greatness, of the classical Renaissance in Italy, and of Louis XIV. in France, when nature is regarded as rude and unfinished, requiring cultivation and alteration by civilised man before it can be regarded as beautiful. There are times of reaction against this, when the manners of primitive or savage men, the outlines of undisturbed country, the flowers of the field, are preferred to the produce of civilisation. Not only in successive generations, but in divers parts of the same society, at any moment, we may find this contrast living and working its results. There are those who recoil from attention to form, from the strictness of law in art, from the tyranny of training, from the fastidiousness of culture, and love what they feel to be spontaneous and unprepared. They think it over-civilised to take offence at faults of form, at discordance of detail, and plead that we lose half the enjoyment of life by insisting upon strict conditions in art. On the other hand, the votary of high culture will not admit that vulgar enjoyment of random beauty is to be called real love of art, or of beauty itself, in its highest and proper development, and asserts that no man can be said to enjoy in an intelligent way a picture, a poem, or a symphony, who does not know why it is beautiful, and does not comprehend the laws of its art.

In a complex society like that of modern Europe, or of the Hellenistic world after Alexander, when the world is not only heir to the splendid art of earlier civilisation, but is working out new forms and learning new types for itself, we may be sure to find both these tendencies represented. But, as is usually the case, we find them both represented by literary men, to whom the reproduction of untutored nature was as much a conscious art as the reproduction of the defunct fables of old Greek mythology. So it has been in every great age, where the romantic has maintained its ground against the classical. The reproduction in art of the simplest nature is, when successful, an outcome of the most deliberate study. So it is that the poems in all Greek literature which approach nearest to romanticism are those of Theocritus, a pedant of Alexandria, a courtier at the most artificial court in the world. If we want a specimen in prose we find it in that most artificial of rhetoricians, Dion

Chrysostom, who, in the middle of frigid panegyrics, of conventional moralities, of professional politics, gives us his idyll of shepherd life in the wilds of Eubœa.

We may now return to the fact from which we have digressed—the total wreck of Alexandrian literature. How far is it true? Only with considerable limitations. We still have, in the first place, the whole body of poems ascribed to Theocritus. Among these some in various metres and of various character may be spurious, but are certainly Alexandrian. This collection of poems is in itself no mean heritage. Then we have the Hymns of Callimachus, containing nearly 1100 lines, together with many fragments. We have the heroic epic of Apollonius Rhodius—the Argonautics, complete. We have the didactic epic of Aratus—the Phænomena and Signs of Weather. We have the Alexandra (or Cassandra) of Lycophron. We have the considerable and peculiar fragments of Timon the Sillograph. Among the collection of Greek epigrams a large number are explicitly assigned to these and other contemporary Alexandrian authors. So also the collection of Anacreontic poems—so well known by the splendid printing of Parma and the versions of Thomas Moore—contain some early Alexandrian pieces, from which, indeed, we may be sure that the genre took its rise. Beside all these considerable specimens we have long and connected quotations from the elegies of Phanocles, of Hermesianax, of Rhianus's epic, and of Alexander the Ætolian, preserved in Stobæus and Athenæus.¹ So also we have not only a great deal of con-greater classical, but from the then known Alexandrian poets.

¹ Cf. Meineke's Analecta Alexandrina. I omit in this catalogue the large body of mathematical writings still extant, which are no doubt the chief glory of Alexandria, but which cannot be ranked as literature. The reader will find a full account of them in Mr. Gow's History of Mathematics at Alexandria, and will be surprised at the number and importance of these books.

This is surely no inconsiderable loss in so distant an age, and it seems to lamenting the loss of the rest, we have to examine and weigh what we possess properly a history of literature. Yet educated classes of Alexandrian literature or references to Callimachus or to be idle if we do not enter briefly ourselves, and give some idea to the nature of their evidence.

At the very outset there arises a difficulty in classifying these poems. Are we to proceed to examine and review the works of each poet separately, or are we obliged to consider epic, lyric, elegy, and so on, in the case of each, for it was the great aim of all these men to excel in every kind of poetry. In the first hand, if we propose to proceed according to the metre, and consider the extant poems in regard to authorship, we find that, as to the different kind of poetry, the distinct classes, so mythological, the epos dramatic. There is real confusion in form; and, as there was fusion of race and dialect, so the variations of both metre and idiom are now arbitrary and superficial, not deep and essential as they were in the older days.

Under these circumstances I feel justified in following the dictates of convenience, and, where we have a great number of fragments from different authors, all of the same sort, to regard them as exponents of the fashion of the age, and treat them as such, while I propose to consider as personal and individual the larger works, of which we have only single specimens, and these from a distinct and recognisable author. Thus the elegy and the epigram may be handled as the general outcome and expression of Alexandrian art-feeling, while the mythological epic, the didactic epic, and the semi-political hymns may be treated as the work of their special authors. But in all our chief object is to find the traces of real life and feeling behind the mask of pedantry and of convention.

ARATUS.—Among the books written by men of the school of Alexandria, and at the epoch of its first greatness, none attained wider popularity than the Phænomena of Aratus.¹ Born at Soli in Cilicia, one of the centres of Stoic

¹ The epigram of Callimachus upon his friend shows us clearly the character of the poem, and its appreciation among the best judges of those days :—

Ἡσιόδου τό τ' αἰσῆμα καὶ ὁ τρόπος, οὐ τῶν ἀοιδῶν ἔσχατον, ἀλλ' ὀκνέω μὴ τὸ μελιχρότατον τῶν ἐπέων ὁ Σολεὺς ἀπεμάξατο. Χαίρετε, λεπταὶ ῥήσιες Ἀρήτου σύμβολον ἀγρυπνίης.—Anth. ix. 507.

As it may interest the reader to compare one of many passages in the Diosemeia copied by Vergil, that he may learn both to esteem Aratus rightly, and learn in another instance the delicate art of Vergil, here is the passage in Aratus—

σῆμα δέ τοι ἀνέμοιο καὶ οἰδάνουσα θάλασσα γινέσθω, καὶ μακρὸν ἐπ' αἰγιαλοὶ βοῶντες, γίνονται, κορυφαί τε βοώμεναι οὔρῳ

Καὶ δ' ἂν ἐπὶ ξηρὴν ὅτ' ἐρωδιὸς ἐξ ἁλὸς ἔρχηται φωνῇ περίαλλα λεκινυμένου κε θάλασσαν ὑπὲρ φορέο.
καὶ ποτε καὶ κέπφοι, ὅπότε' εὐδιοὶ π ἀντία μελλόντων ἀνέμων εἴληδὰ φέπολλάκι δ' ἀγριάδες νῆσσαι ἢ εἶνα) αἰθυαὶ χερσαῖα τινάσσονται πτερίἢ νεφέλη ὄρεος μηκύνεται ἐν κορυφῇ ἤδη καὶ πάπποι, λευκῆς γήρειον ἀκι-σῆμ' ἐγένοντ' ἀνέμου, κωφῆς ἁλὸς ἐ ἄκρον ἐπιπλείωσι, τὰ μὲν πάρος, ἄλ

Καὶ θέρεος βρονταί τε καὶ ἀστραι ἐνθεν ἐπερχομένοιο περισκοπέειν ἂν καὶ διὰ νύκτα μέλαιναν ὅτ' ἀστέρες ταρφέα, τοὶ δ' ὀπιθεν ῥυμοὶ ὑπολευ-δειδέχθαι κείνοις αἰτὴν ὁδὸν ἐρχομέ-πνεύματος· ἦν δὲ καὶ ἄλλοι ἐναντίοι ἄλλοι δ' ἐξ ἄλλων μερέων, τότε δὴ ἰ παντοίων ἀνέμων, οἳ τ' ἄκριτοὶ εἰσι ἄκριτα δὲ πνείουσιν ἐπ' ἀνδράσι τεκ-αὐτὰρ ὅτ' ἐξ εὐροιο καὶ ἐκ νότου ἀστ, ἄλλοτε δ' ἐκ ζεφύροιο καὶ ἄλλοτε πὰ δὴ τότε τις πελάγει ἐνι δείδιε ναυτίλ-μή μιν τῇ μὲν ἔχῃ πέλαγος τῇ δ' ἐκ ὕδατι γὰρ τοσσαῖδε περὶ στεροπαὶ φ πολλάκι δ' ἐρχομένων ὑετῶν νέφεα π οἷα μάλιστα πόκοισιν ἐοικότες ἰνδάλλ-ἢ διδύμη ἔζωσε διὰ μέγαν οὐρανὸν ἱρ

on all manner of subjects, not omitting the criticism of Homer. But we have nothing of all these treatises except the versification of the astronomy of Eudoxus, with extracts from the Signs of Weather of Theophrastus. It is a sort of "Story of the heavens," giving, in easy and fluent verse, an account of the division of the fixed stars into constellations, of the zones of the heaven, and the signs of the Zodiac. Even the ancients found out mistakes in Aratus's science, and of course the newer system of Copernicus has made all his theory obsolete. But the old constellations still keep their fanciful names and their places, and the signs of weather, adapted by Vergil with great grace in his first Georgic, are as good as the signs of weather now accepted as prognostics by the ordinary public. So then there is still interest about the poem, if it were only as a record of the knowledge attained in this branch of observation by the accumulated wisdom of the early Greeks. But the spirit of Aristotle, which dominated all the science of Alexandria, is upon Aratus, and though a Stoic in ethics, he has adopted in physics that love of minute and dry detail which marks the Peripatetic school. The sublime myths and visions of Plato give way to the dull enumeration of facts, to the indexing of nature, which his great pupil had introduced. So the Phænomena wants the higher afflatus of Democritus, whom we know through Lucretius, where a great theory inspires the poet, and so transforms him that he is always splendid, whether in argument or in digression. The same art of exquisite digression relieves the tedium of didactic poetry in Vergil's Georgics; but Aratus never rises to such a level.

I fancy this difference is due not to the inferiority of the poet so much as to the temper of the age, and to the special design which he had in composing his work. It is com-practical politician, whose every act was with a purpose of securing a solid and lasting benefit to the Greek peninsula, sent for a didactic poem to popularise the knowledge of the heavens by way of general culture? I trow not. The usual of the Phænomena will show the true purpose.

If the old handbook of Hesiod was a treatise on improvement of agriculture, and addressed to a farmer, this book on the heavens is particularly addressed to a sailor, and intended for his benefit. As the conditions of navigation were changing, and the culture and the increase of luxury in the Greek world. Formerly, as campaigns had been made only during the summer season, so ships sailed only over the seas in the fair weather, when the sky was clear, and the Mediterranean seldom disturbed by a passing storm. But now the sea was constantly carrying merchandise all the year round.

¹ μὴ κείνῳ ἐνὶ μηνὶ περικλίζοιο θαλάσσης
πεπταμένῳ πελάγει κεχρημένος. οὐδ' πολλὴν πειρήνειας, ἐπεὶ ταχυνώταται οὐτ' ἂν τοι νυκτὸς πεφοβημένῳ ἐγγίθῃ πῶς.

ready to risk the fierce tempests of winter for the sake of rich profit and successful competition with rival traders. At such a season it was not possible to depend upon the Wain or the Polar star, which might be often clouded ; men must be able to direct their course by a general knowledge of the heavens, so that a scrap of clear sky might serve them in dark and stormy nights.

It was for this great and increasing industry that the Phænomena of Aratus were written, and proved an inestimable handbook. There was no waste or digression in the work. It enumerated the known constellations, gave their relative places and the seasons of their rise and setting, with an account of the zones of the heavens, the received signs of weather, and all the information required in a nautical almanac of those days. It seems therefore probable that the book was suggested and encouraged by Antigonus for the special purpose of promoting Macedonian trade. He must have felt that it was in this that his kingdom was inferior to those of his rivals, and probably the Macedonians and Greeks who took to commerce were inferior in knowledge to the men of Alexandria and Antioch who had old Egyptian and Phœnician traditions.

Not a little remarkable is the fact that Aratus omits in his catalogue all stars and constellations not visible in Greek waters, even though they were very prominent in the skies of Egypt, which he knew perfectly well. Thus the star Canopus, the most brilliant fixed star next to Sirius in all the heavens, which becomes visible south of Rhodes, is, as ἤμεθ', ἐκ' αἰγιαλοῦς τετραμμένοι· οἱ δ' ἔτι πόρῳ 920

κλύζονται· ὀλίγον δέ δια ξύλον 'Αἶδ' ἐρύκει.

The scholia on this passage and also vv. 408-430 imply winter sailing. The crowd of epitaphs in the Anthology on the victims of the sea show but too clearly what risks were incurred in the pursuit of luxuries across the seas.

...it seem to me that he con-special and deliberate exclusion of a serve Egyptian trade, and certainly not in which case such omissions would all.² If further researches could show accompanied by similar practical business, we might get a further insight a great and good king. But, as a Stoic he would patronise not literature and ar-knowledge, nor need we regret this, at genius for creating literary and artistic f

A far greater astronomer, Eratosth-(in the next generation) a poetical :
unfortunately all lost but a few stray fi in this man, from whom we should ex-teaching but independent research, the were so strong that we turn with great For we know that Eratosthenes entitle and framed it on the model of those hex-were of old known as Homeric, and wh imitated. The birth and early adventu

¹ On vv. 351, 367, 498.

² Yet it is certainly remarkable how timid described, not omitting sundry homely scenes among the lower classes, which seem specially to have attracted these courtly pedants. Then came the invention of the lyre, and the ascent of Hermes to heaven, where he finds with wonder the harmony of the spheres, and describes the beauty of the heavens.

Yet even here, it seems, the Alexandrian fashion of telling love-stories came out, for in connection with the unison produced by Kypri and Hermes there seems to have been a long digression in the passion of Hermes for the goddess, and their union in Egypt. A story of this kind seems to have been as necessary to any narrative poem of the day as it was to any drama produced in the days of Louis XIV. Racine could not rehandle the Hippolytus of Euripides without destroying its character by giving the chaste hero a secret flame, and obtruding the vulgarity of an ordinary love-affair upon the mighty passion of Phædra and the virginal purity of Hippolytus. So Eratosthenes could not catalogue the stars and describe their paths without digressing upon their loves, and bringing up again a dead mythology to minister to the artificial taste of the day. This, as I have said, makes us admire the more the abstinence of Aratus, who, if he be dry and cold, is at least always to the point, and if often below the majesty of his subject, is always above vulgarity. It is probably due to the Stoical principles of the man and of the honourable sovran whom he served. To this philosophy, too, we may ascribe the true dignity of the famous prologue, which, like those of Parmenides's philosophical poem, as well as of other didactic poets, ensured attention for the work. This prologue, though often cited and translated, may fairly find a place here, that the reader may see for himself the best kind of work that was produced in the decadence of Greek literature :—

μιμνήσκων βιότοιο· λέγει δ' ὅτε βοῦσί τε καὶ μακέλῃσι, λέγει δ' καὶ φυτόν γινώσκει καὶ σπέρματα αὐτὸς γὰρ τάγε σήματ' ἐν οὐρανῷ ἄστρον διακρίνας· ἐσκέψατο δ' εἰς ἀστέρας, οἳ κε μάλιστα τετυγμένῃ ἀνδράσιν ὥράων, ὅφρ' ἔμπεδα πάν-τῃ μιν αἰὲν πρῶτόν τε καὶ ἔσχατον χαῖρε, πάτερ, μέγα θαῦμα, μέγ' ἄ-νθρωπος καὶ προτέρη γενεή· χαίρομιλίχαι μάλα πᾶσιν· ἐμοί γε μέγ' ἢ θέμις εὐχομένῳ τεκμήρατε πᾶσι

As regards the practical use made be well to refer to a curious passage in importance of practical astronomy to st
 It is there shown, probably in relation t carried out by Aratus of Sicyon, how i commander, who cannot foresee and gu phenomena, such as storms and rain, to laws which determine the length of da amount of moonlight on a fixed night.
 that they had no penny calendars to mistakes might easily be made.

manner of serious subjects, and it was rather exceptional to find it in Mimnermus, an early poet whose amorous complaints were composed in the rhythm of martial and gnostic teaching. Callinus, Tyrtæus, Solon, and Theognis show clearly that any serious subject might be handled in this way, and yet the time came when elegy became absolutely confined to a single meaning, and was held to signify a lament, if not of disappointed love, at least of disappointed affection. This is reported to have been the original meaning of the word in its supposed Phrygian home.

But in the great days of the perfected lyric systems and of dramatic poetry, the old elegy went out of fashion, and we know of no important representative of that kind of verse (beyond epitaphs and epigrams) except Antimachus of Colophon, a poet celebrated and decried, fashionable and forgotten in turn, but who certainly was great enough to set up a model which had fatal effects on the Alexandrians. His Lyde, a learned and pedantic lament, in which he ransacked theogonies and mythologies for heroic parallels to his misfortunes in love, and professed to beguile his real grief by the recollection of unreal and shadowy tales, was known to good critics for its laboured learning and frigid effect, nor do we hear of its attaining any real importance till there arose a new and great generation of pedants, whom the altered fashion of the day prompted to sing of love, while all their training urged them to parade their erudition.

These two veins, then, ran through all the elegies of the Alexandrian poets, and it is hard to say which occupied a larger place in the minds of the writers. But while the extant Greek fragments are decidedly more learned than passionate, most of them being cited for their recondite lore, there is no doubt that their great legacy to posterity was the portraiture of passion, and that not so much by way of

of elegiac poems in which Alexandria
what there is left is not by any means th

The Bath of Pallas, a poem written Doric dialect for the feast of the solemn statue at Argos, is distinctly a hymn hymns to Zeus and Apollo, and is v together with them in all editions of most of the fragments from the Αἴτια, handbook of antiquarian lore, in which t informed the poet as to the reasons of ancient customs, the origin of cities a names, are naturally of merely antiquari this very poem it was a digression whic for a great and endless mass of books of course, frequent, where a pedant full c handled any subject, but still more beca poets knew well enough that their read relief from the dryness of antiquarian k have a story in them, which, though in really the principal feature in the poc which we shall consider along with its ri had scenes of peasant life and manners

Callimachus, and the prose résumé by Aristænetus, give us all the main facts of this remarkable story—remarkable because we may regard it as undoubtedly the first literary original of that sort of tale which makes falling in love and happy marriage the beginning and the end, while the obstacles to this union form the details, of the plot.

It seems almost inconceivable that such a topic should have escaped the Greeks hitherto, and there are not wanting references to the Kalyke of Stesichorus,¹ the story of a maiden's hapless love and suicide. But neither this solitary and far remote attempt, nor the love affairs in the New Comedy, which start with the rape or seduction of the heroine, can be regarded as taking ought from the originality of the Alexandrian, unless, indeed, it be that the pure love of Acontius and Cydippe was in conscious contrast to the passions of Menander's stage. For the tale ran in this wise:—

There were once upon a time two young people of marvellous beauty, called Acontius and Cydippe. [The poet did not proceed without describing fully this beauty, and exhausting himself in metaphors to express it.] All previous attempts on the part of any youth or maiden to gain their affections had been fruitless; and the one went about, a modern Achilles in manly splendour; the other, with the roses and lilies of her cheeks, added a fourth to the number of the Graces.² But the god Eros (now already the winged urchin of the Anacreontics), angry at this contumacy, determined to assert his power. They met at a feast of Delos, she from

¹ Cf. my Hist. of Gk. Class. Lit. i. 202.

² This stock phrase (in later love-stories) meets us in an epigram of Callimachus on Queen Berenice (Anth. v. 146)—

Τέσσαρες αἱ Χάριτες· ποτὶ γὰρ μίᾳ ταῖς τρισὶ κείναις ἀρτι ποτεπλάσθη, κῆτι μύροισι νοτεῖ εὐαίων ἐν πᾶσιν ἀρίζηλος Βερενίκα ἄς ἄτερ οὐδ' αὐταὶ ταὶ Χάριτες Χάριτες.

gave her nurse
the words to the girl, who blushed at oath which she had never taken. But an absorbing passion, and the situation the ignorance or hardness of heart of determined to marry her to another trates her with sore sickness, and the Meanwhile Acontius flies the city wanders disconsolate through the woods and streams his love, writing Cydippe filling all the groves with his sighs.
the maiden prepared her wedding, and rendered their preparations vain. At last to consult the oracle at Delphi, which then ordered him no longer to thwart the gods arrives at Athens. The young couple tale ends with an explicit description of Here, then, is the first specimen of a as produced among the later Greeks prose and verse. We have still extant the in verse, in prose the whole body of Greek everlasting changes on the same topic.

in the Metamorphoses and Epistles of He

Callimachus originate the subject, he even gave a model for its treatment which dominated all his followers. M. Couat notices some of the points in this interesting piece of literary tradition. In the first place the description of the lovers is carried out to an extravagant extent, and the novelist tries to rival painting and sculpture in producing a portrait of his characters. This description—a stock chapter in Greek novels—was in most cases overdrawn, and fails to produce any clear image. Secondly, neither Callimachus nor his imitators turned to that curious psychological history of the growth of the passion of love which forms so important a chapter in modern novels. Love comes suddenly, violently, at first sight, and generally by the direct interposition of the god Cupid, as we may see in Vergil's Æneid in the case of Dido. So we have it in Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet, which is throughout an echo of a Greek love-tale handed down through Italian sources.

Hence the first meeting of the lovers is a capital point in the tale. Then comes, of course, the narrative of their passion, thwarted by circumstances among which the unsympathetic conduct of parents is doubtless the most usual.¹ The protector and go-between during the separation is the girl's nurse—here again we have Shakespeare; and the pangs of the lover are described just as they are described in the case of his Orlando—dishevelled hair, blackness under the eyes, disordered dress, a desire for solitude, and the habit of writing the girl's name on every tree—symptoms which are perhaps now regarded as natural, and which many romantic persons have no doubt imitated because they found maiden, and the importance of its happy conclusion of marriage. In contrast to the New Comedy, neither Cythereas in the subsequent novels were of great interest in the plot, were it not that they had to conquer the risks they encounter, through virtue or of circumstances. It is so in the Alceste of the later Greeks, and it may be that in an age not remarkable for morality, and in a license both of living and of writing, to hold with such interest of so noble a world they describe is not a moral work. The world of immoralities and violences abroad like the lady in Comus, is to be proof against temptation. It was therefore a task left for Callimachus, to propagate a new ideal of life among men. The sounder philosophy embraced it. Even in the luxurious court of such moral elevation was respected. The Stoic tenets so widely disseminated in the East had effect in the acceptance of a stricter and more virtuous life. But whatever may be the cause, the result is the same.

¹ In the extant prose novels there is also a strong element of romance in the risks and adventures of voyage, and the visiting of strange lands, which marked the literature of Alexandria. The fables of the life of Alexander ascribed to Callisthenes are of this character, and such adventures become regular stock-in-trade among later Greek novelists.

THE LATER GREEKS.

the Roman imitators show clearly that this maiden purity was no universal feature in the Alexandrian elegy. There were horrid stories of unnatural passions and terrible tragedies of criminal love celebrated in their accounts of mythical life. But it was the type of the Acontius and Cydippe which fascinated the age, and held its ground through changing generations.

In the Actia then, the digression, for digression it was, became the most celebrated episode in the poem, just as in Vergil's Æneid, or Apollonius's Argonautics, the love-story is read by many that take no interest in the rest of the epic. But the mythological stories, the explanation of local myths and customs—these were no doubt the chief subjects aimed at by the Alexandrian elegy. We can see this mixture of erudition and sentiment, of mythology and reality, in the poems of Propertius, who is no doubt the closest imitator of Callimachus among the Romans.

But I must not forget to mention another curious feature in these poems, which is the habit of sketching realistic scenes from ordinary life. As if to vindicate themselves from the charge of antiquarian pedantry, these poets determined to show that they could paint human nature also, and in no case is this more curiously obvious than in the Coma Berenices, which Catullus has fortunately preserved for us in a very elegant Latin version. This occasional poem, composed as it were by the laureate of the day, by way of delicate flattery to the reigning queen, celebrated the accession to the constellations of the lock of hair which she had vowed at the temple of Aphrodite in case of the safe return of her husband Euergetes from his famous Asiatic campaign. The young king had departed in haste, just after his marriage, but the way in which the poet describes the parting of the king and queen is so realistic as to be

... the 2013, which Ovid paraphrased — commentators are at limachus showered all the vials of Apollonius, who had stung him with in his rage he could not lay aside his of heroic and mythological punishment poem, as models of what he prayed

Thus we see the elegy used for s we add that in the Bath of Pallas v dialect but lively dramatic dialogue proven that metre was no longer vehicle for a particular kind of th technical form in which a clever so kind of ingenuity and of learning.

So far our notions of the Alexandrian drawn from Callimachus, the best celebrated of his time. But if the works been preserved, would our estimate have he more learned and consequently more rest? Most likely not. We have a kind of Philetas, the earliest of this series, and spiritual father, was better than he called to Alexandria from his native

new school and not the last of the old—we can trace not only in his fragments, but still more in his pupil Theocritus, that bucolic vein, that love of the country and of external nature, which was certainly wanting in Callimachus. But we do not possess a single fragment of his containing more than a couple of lines, and we must be satisfied with the judgment of the Romans, who made him equal with Callimachus, and copied him with equal assiduity.

Discounting single lines or words, we have from three other of these poets, perhaps less celebrated, but still great people in their day, three fragments of sufficient length to let us know that we have not lost anything very precious in this clever but laboured school of elegy. There is a passage preserved from the Apollo of Alexander the Ætolian, one of the men who organised the library for the second Ptolemy. He was a fellow-worker with the 'dark' Lycophron, and a friend of Antigonus. He represents the god foretelling a story of guilty passion on the part of a young married woman, narrating the facts without any real portraiture of character.¹

A more interesting fragment on the death of Orpheus remains from Phanocles, a very unknown poet, who turned his attention to that romantic affection for youths which we see in Plato's Lysis, Charmides, and Symposium.² The legend is evidently told in order to explain, first, why Lesbos was so famous for poetical song; secondly, why the Thracians tattooed their wives. Thus we have the ætiological complexion of Callimachus plainly before us.

Ἦ ὥς Οἰάγροιο πάϊς Ορηίκιος Ὀρφεὶς ἐκ θυμοῦ Κάλαϊν στέρξε Βορηιάδην, πολλάκι δὲ σκιεροῖσιν ἐν ἄλσεσιν ἔζετ' αἰείδων
 ὄν πόθον, οὐδ' ἦν οἱ θυμὸς ἐν ἡσυχίῃ,

¹ The reader will find it in Meineke's Analecta, p. 219.

² Cf. my Social Life in Greece, p. 330 sq.

ἀλλ' αἰεὶ μιν ἄγρυπνοι ὑπὸ ψυχῇ μελεδῶναι ἔτρυχον, θαλερὸν δερκομένου Κάλαϊν.
 τὸν μὲν Βιστονίδες κακομήχανοι ἀμφιχυθείσαι ἔκτανον, εὐήκη φάσγανα θηξάμεναι, οὐνεκα πρῶτος δείξεν ἐνὶ Θρήκεσσιν ἔρωτας ἄρρενας, οὐδὲ πόθους ἦνεσε θηλυτέρων.
 τοῦ δ' ἀπὸ μὲν κεφαλὴν χαλκῇ τάμον, αὐτίκα δ' αὐτὴν εἰς ἄλα Θρηκίην ῥίψαν ὁμοῦ χέλυν ἦλψ καρτύνασαι, ἵν' ἐμφορέοιντο θαλάσση ἄμφω ἅμα, γλαυκοῖς τεγγόμεναι ῥοθίοις.
 τὰς δ' ἱερῇ Λέσβῳ πολιὴ ἐπέκελσε θάλασσα· ἡχὴ δ' ὥς λιγυρῆς πόντον ἐπέσχε λύρης, νήσους τ' αἰγιαλούς θ' ἀλιμυρέας, ἔνθα λίγειαν ἀνέρες Ὀρφεῖν ἐκτέρισαν κεφαλὴν.
 ἐν δὲ χέλυν τύμβῳ λιγυρὴν θέσαν, ἥ καὶ ἀναύδους πέτρας καὶ Φόρκου στυγνὸν ἔπειθεν ὕδωρ.
 ἐκ κείνου μολπαί τε καὶ ἱμερτὴ κιθαριστὺς
 νῆσον ἔχει, πασέων δ' ἐστὶν ἀοιδοτάτη.
 Θρηῆκες δ' ὥς ἐδάησαν ἀρήιοι ἔργα γυναικῶν ἄγρια, καὶ πάντας δεινὸν ἐσῆλθεν ἄχος, ἃς ἀλόχους ἔστιζον, ἵν' ἐν χροῖ σήματ' ἔχουσιν κυάνεα στυγεροῦ μὴ λελάθοιντο φόνου.
 ποινὰς δ' Ὀρφῇ κταμένῳ στίζουσι γυναῖκας
 εἰς ἔτι νῦν κείνης εἵνεκεν ἀμπλακίης.

The fragment would appear to us pathetic and beautiful, were we not all familiar with Vergil's far more pathetic and refined narrative in his fourth Georgic, where the digression is no doubt modelled closely upon those of the Alexandrian school, and the very legend copied from this and other like poets. But the touch of genius is there, and has transformed the baser metal of his models into pure gold. I give the passage here, that the reader may not have the trouble of seeking it among his books.

Ipse cava solans aegrum testudine amorem
Te, dulcis coniunx, te solo in litore secum,
Te veniente die, te decedente canebat.
Taenarias etiam fauces, alta ostia Ditis,
Et caligantem nigra formidine lucum
Ingressus Manesque adiit Regemque tremendum, Nesciaque humanis precibus mansuescere corda.
At cantu commotae Erebi de sedibus imis
Umbrae ibant tenues simulacraque luce carentum,
Quam multa in foliis avium se milia condunt,
Vesper ubi aut hibernus agit de montibus imber,
Matres atque viri defunctaque corpora vita
Magnanimum heroum, pueri innuptaeque puellae,
Impositique rogis iuvenes ante ora parentum ;
Quos circum limus niger et deformis harundo
Cocyti tardaue palus inamabilis unda
Alligat, et noviens Styx interfusa coercet.
Quin ipsae stupuere domus atque intima Leti
Tartara caeruleosque implexae crinibus angues
Eumenides, tenuitque inhians tria Cerberus ora, Atque Ixionii vento rota constitit orbis.
Iamque pedem referens casus evaserat omnis,
Redditaue Eurydice superas veniebat ad auras
Pone sequens, namque hanc dederat Proserpina legem,
Cum subita incautum dementia cepit amantem,
Ignoscenda quidem, scirent si ignoscere Manes :
Restitit, Eurydicenque suam iam luce sub ipsa
Immemor heu victusque animi respexit : ibi omnis
Effusus labor atque immitis rupta tyranni
Foedera terque fragor stagnis auditus Avernus.
Illa, ' Quis et me,' inquit, ' miseram et te perdidit, Orpheu, Quis tantus furor ? En iterum crudelia retro
Fata vocant, conditque natantia lumina somnus.
Iamque vale : feror ingenti circumdata nocte
Invalidasque tibi tendens, heu non tua, palmas.'
Dixit, et ex oculis subito, ceu fumus in auras
Commixtus tenuis, fugit diversa, neque illum
Prensantem nequiquam umbras et multa volentem
Dicere praeterea vidit ; nec portitor Orci Amplius obiectam passus transire paludem.
Quid faceret ? quo se rapta bis coniuge ferret ?

Amisos queritur fetus, quos de Observans nido implumes detra
 Flet noctem, ramoque sedens n
 Integrat, et maestis late loca qu
 Nulla Venus, non ulli animum
 Solus hyperboreas glacies Tana
 Arvaque Riphaeis numquam vic Lustrabat, raptam Eurydicen at Dona querens ; sprete Ciconur
 Inter sacra deum nocturnique o
 Discerptum latos iuvenem spars
 Tum quoque marmorea caput a Gurgite cum medio portans Oea Volveret, Eurydicen vox ipsa et
 "Ah miseram Eurydicen," anim
 Eurydicen toto referebant flumin

Hermesianax is to us more impo him all but a hundred lines of elegy enumeration of all the poets of antic had all suffered from the pangs of lo books, was addressed to his mistress stock in trade for these hards, like th the Romans. She was a learned lac she was, and he entertained her, Antimachus,¹ with all this nodantur

repeated from him in the collection of Parthenius.¹ This considerable fragment gives us perhaps the clearest evidence as to the character of the whole school. The poet is content to gather from the four winds of heaven any obscure story which answers his purpose; even Homer in love with Penelope, and Socrates with Aspasia, do not strike him as absurd. The whole situation is admirably summed up by Couat, whom I have so often cited throughout this chapter, and whose admirable style may be judged by the following specimen:—

À vrai dire, il faut se méfier. Adresser à une femme qu'on aime trois livres d'élégies où il est continuellement question de l'amour des autres, depuis l'origine des choses, et jamais du vôtre; lui parler toujours des femmes d'autrefois et jamais d'elle; dérouler patiemment un catalogue très complet, et même quelque peu grossi, de ce qu'on dit les poètes les plus obscurs sur les héros les plus inconnus, perdre son temps dans ces efforts de versificateur érudit, ce temps si précieux, quand vous auriez tant de choses à dire sur elle, sur vous, sur vos plaisirs, sur vos ennuis, sur ces mille riens qui sont toute la vie; aimer une femme et lui écrire comme à un être abstrait sans couleur et sans forme; ce n'est pas ainsi qu'un vrai poète, un Catulle, joyeux ou désespéré, caressant ou brutal, parle de sa Lesbie.²

The text of Hermesianax is so unlikely to be found under the reader's hand—so few possess a copy of Athenæus—that I shall consult his convenience by citing it in the Appendix.

It would be idle to delay over the wrecks of the learned love poetry; let us pass to the epigrams, which will not detain us by any means so long.

¹ This is a collection of prose love-tales, Erotica, culled from these poets in after days by Parthenius, who lived about 60 B.C. The story of Leucippus and Arsinoë is given by Antoninus Liberalis, and adapted with changed names by Ovid, Metam. xiv. 698 sq.

² A. Couat, La Poésie alexandrine, p. 81.

... and purposes, but always their origin in their name - epigram such as Simonides, had been famous inscriptions in elegiac verse, and they sist mainly in simplicity ; but their offerings in temples—in fact any more commemoration—suggested and obtained till the Alexandrian age that the epigram fashion, and exercised the wit of the poets.
actual inscriptions in temples and on tombs mation, or to claim the sympathy of, though to read them, but to show in smart and the feelings, or rather what the art, could he reflected upon the object of his epigram.
such famous statues as the Niobe or the Laocöe forth strings of epigrams ; so does the poet of Lysippus ; and so again do pathetic epigrams such as the death of a bride, the loss of a grave of a misanthrope. The epitaph plain, is only a particular species of the and the votive epigram were the primary sudden growth of amatory literature at erotic epigram, wherein the lover not prouder if Alexandria applauded the grace of his epigram than if it whispered the success of his suit.

The great body of the Anthology dates from an age posterior to that of the early Ptolemies, for when once this kind of poem came into fashion, which required no sustained genius, no high poetical gifts, and in which any literary man who got hold of a good point might make a name, it was practised with assiduity for centuries, and reaches down into Byzantine days. But we have sufficient remains of named epigrams by Callimachus, Rhianus, Asclepiades, Theocritus, to tell us that the real masters of this artificial school were the early Alexandrians. We are here again faced by our old difficulty of piercing through the veil of conceits and allegories and fables—for to them the old mythology was scarcely more—to the feelings of the real men beneath. The few who have read through the Anthology with care, like Mr. J. A. Symonds,¹ write about it with enthusiasm, and the choice specimens which they cite seem to sustain their judgment. It is therefore very reluctantly that I confess a different opinion, and take sides with the great bulk of classical readers, by whom this collection of poems has been treated with neglect. No study seems to me more wearisome and profitless than the Anthology. There are, it is true, brilliant gems there, but in a bank of mud, or worse than mud. Not to speak of obscenity, there is such obvious artificiality, such posing, such false joy and grief, such sacrifice of substance to form, that the soul of the reader which thirsts after the real companionship of other souls is like the despairing Dido in her dreams,

‘semper longam incommitata videtur
ire viam et Tyrios deserta quærere terra.’

¹ Studies of the Greek Poets, chap. xi.

—a deification without modesty, with Even the hymns of Callimachus, as are only nominally hymns to Zeus are hymns to Ptolemy. The other which comes out is the jealousy and vanity of literary success. The com-may so call them, are far the most tion. Unfortunately they are very femented by the controversial alluhymns, and disclose to us a society than that of modern pedants, where ing becomes so absorbing a pursuit after truth, and makes the accuracy of ing petty mistakes more prized than of attacking unsolved problems, pre-prized than wealth of matter, the care-prized than the careless explorer.

TIMON OF PHLIUS.—Far more ori-epic of Aratus was the mock epic of philosopher Timon of Phlius, who, as as a stage-dancer, took to philosophy system of Pyrrho by his writings men, and from whom he heard prophecies concerning all the famous philosophers down to his own time. His short and pungent descriptions of these men, as pungent as those of Carlyle, and as full of pregnant coinages of words, were constantly cited by Diogenes Laertius and Sextus Empiricus,¹ so that we have some 150 lines from his Silloi, together with some elegiac fragments. His sympathies and antipathies are, of course, strongest as regards his own contemporaries—praise of Pyrrho, contempt of Epicurus, still greater contempt of the hencoops of stuffed literary capons at Alexandria.² We cannot offer any opinion as to the philosophical power of the man, but his knowledge of Homer and his capacity as a critic not only appear from his ingenious and accurate parodies of Homeric style, but also from his advice to a brother critic, to trust to old copies of the poems, and not to the new revisions.

The school he represents speaks to us of the weariness of life and the despair of finding truth, so common in a luxurious and decaying society, and yet his verses are far more lively and original than those of the poets who regarded their age as a brilliant advance upon simpler generations. No doubt satire was much in fashion among these jealous and not very original writers. We have it not only in the savage Ibis of Catullus, but in many of the epigrams, where

¹ c.g. ἀνθρωποι κενεῆς οἰήσιος ἐμπλεοι ἀσκοί.
ἀμφοτερογλώσσου τε μέγα σθένος οὐκ ἀλαπαδνὸν Ζήνωνος.

κοκκυστῆς ὀχλολοῖδος Ἡράκλειτος.

(Anaxarchus)—φύσις δέ μιν ἔμπαλιν ἤγειν ἡδονοπλήξ, ἣν πλεῖστοι ὑποτρεῖουσι σοφιστῶν

(Socrates)—μυκτῆρ, ῥητορόμκτος, ὑπάττικος, εἰρωνεύστης.

I cull these from many such phrases.

² πολλοὶ μὲν βόσκονται ἐν Αἰγύπτῳ πολυφύλῳ βιβλιακοὶ χαρακῖται, ἀπείριτα δηριόωντες Μουσέων ἐν ταλάρῳ.

prudent search after originality would have been a waste of talent. We find such things, though revolting to refinement, would not meet with that public censure of Christian morals provides for a large section of men. Yet for all that Timon interested strictly Alexandrian literati, in that he treated the questions of the day in his serious works, his relaxations may have been.

The fragments of Timon afford a confusion of styles of which we have no example. Though his works were formally didactic, he hesitates, from the complexion of the fragments, that they were mainly satirical, and yet he chooses the heroic hexameter. In this he follows excellent models. The sportive verses, such as the Margites and Batrachomyomachia, clearly a satiric intention, and so the poet distinguishes himself by high authority, apart from the usual in the older philosophical poet.

¹ Fragments of Sotades are to be found scattered in various authors, and are all more or less of the same character.

machus makes a personal attack in the way of satire he does it (in the Ibis) in elegiacs, thus confusing the poetical tradition, and adopting a new metre for a subject properly to be treated in iambics. But regarded as philosophy, the Silli were an attempt to preach reasoned truth in verse—a universal habit at one time in Greece, when, in fact, prose was unknown or undeveloped, but long passed out of fashion, since Plato had treated the most poetical of systems in prose, and Aristotle had taught men to regard the matter only, and to despise the form, in philosophical teaching.¹ This late return to poetry as a vehicle for philosophy is not without its analogies elsewhere, as, for example, the Fable of the Bees and the Essay on Man in English literature. But it is rather the sceptical and satirical side of philosophy, the field of criticism, than the didactic side, which is suited to the vehicle of verse. Hence it is that this critical vein decidedly predominates in late philosophical poetry.

THE LYRIC POETRY OF ALEXANDRIA.—What we know of the lyrics composed by the pedants of the museum is rather negative than positive. In the first place, we must define lyrical, in Greek poetry, as denoting not only a kind of subject, but still more as excluding certain kinds of metre. Thus the hymns of Callimachus, being in hexameters or elegiacs, are excluded by their form from the category of lyrics, though their subjects might well have been treated lyrically. So also the epigrams, which are mostly in the same well-established metres, can hardly be classed as lyrical, which implies a form specially intended for musical expression and dancing, not for reading or recitation. What is properly lyric or melic poetry, as the Greeks called it, is either the school of Lesbos, the stanzas of Alcæus and Sappho and the songs of Anacreon, or the

¹ Cf. my Hist. of Grk. Class. Lit. i. 127.

... reduced to a minimum, and of singers who imitated, in later Athens, masters of Lesbos or of Thebes. It complicated rhythms of Pindar even became that without a trained chorus and could no more be performed than ordinary people.

Thus while strange metres were rare andria, complicated systems of metres were never attempted. We do not find development in this direction, except in poems in honour of Cybele, which seem to be of Alexandrian origin.¹ The far has all the air of being a translation from this period, possibly of Callimachus, in the grammarian Hephæstion of Alexandria this metre.² The Atys may be called excited movement, its enthusiasm, and removing it from the staid lines of epic. But all the metre is uniform, and it is more singing than to singing.

The lyric pieces, or what are called the collection of Theocritus are simi-recognised department.¹ They affect strange dialects, but just as Tennyson does, without any essential reason, and by no means as a natural effusion in the poet's own tongue. Hence these highly artificial exercises have attained no celebrity among the remains of the great bucolic master.

Far more popular are the love-songs handed down to us under the name of Anacreon, but which modern scholars have universally recognised as spurious, and as belonging to the later period of Hellenism. The inspiration of these poems is plainly that of Alexandria and its spirit. The Lovegod, with his quiver and his bow, his wings and his fair cheeks, his flitting among roses and shooting privily at human hearts—all this now vulgar sentimentality owed its origin to the conceits of the city of the Ptolemies. The real Anacreon had a far different conception of that delight and bane of mortals.

But the real reason why a special school of lyric poetry in lyric metres did not thrive at Alexandria was that other fields encroached upon the old domain of Pindar and Simonides. As M. Couat justly observes, the old Homeric hymns had been to some extent lyrics in hexameter metre, the epic or narrative form not being clearly distinguished from the lyric hymn or prayer or personal expression of sentiment. In the golden age of Greek literature these fields became widely separated, and marked by distinct literary forms, but in the decadence there was (as is often the case) a reversion to the old indistinctness, and so we find that the lyrics of the Alexandrians were not to be separated from elegy and epigram, nay, at times not even from hexameter poetry. This will appear more clearly when we turn to the examination of the only considerable remains of Callimachus, his once famous hymns, which are now well-nigh forgotten.

¹ These little poems of Theocritus are numbered xxvii. and xxviii. in the collection, and are in (1) simple choriambics, like Horace's Nullam Vare sacra vite prius severis arborem, or (2) in a mixture of glyconic and trochaic difficult to read metrically. As to subjects, the first is a graceful little address in Doric dialect to a spindle, which the poet was sending as a present to the wife of his friend Nicias; the second a love-complaint, in Æolic dialect, to a beloved youth. The latter seems modelled on some such poem of Alcæus, or other old Lesbian master; the former has nothing distinctive about it but its personal and specially occasional character.

THE HYMNS OF CALLIMACHUS, OF CLEANTHES, AND THEOCRITUS.—If we compare what we know of Philadelphus, as regards policy, with what we know of his successors, we note his complete devotion to the Greek world, to Greek alliances, influences, and letters. In all the documents or fragments I have cited from his reign, there is not a single allusion showing any interest in Egyptian life, manners, or culture. Egypt, so far as these learned men mention it, means Alexandria, its palace, its museum, and nothing more. We have hardly a hieroglyphic or even bilingual inscription from his reign, nor do we know of any great Egyptian temple built by him, and covered with his inscriptions, like those of Euergetes, Philopator, Epiphanes, and other of his successors. Probably the national reaction which caused such difficulties to the fourth and fifth Ptolemies, and which produced mahdis and prophecies and insurrections, had not yet set in. The Egyptians were at peace and in plenty. They had got rid of the hated Persians; and though the very first Ptolemy had made the fatal mistake of putting them on a different political footing from the Greeks, and under a special minister, they were not used to any greater liberty, and for the time seem to have acquiesced in the Græco-Macedonian rule.

But even Philadelphus's son and successor, Euergetes I., a great conqueror, must have discovered the necessity of further conciliating the national priesthood, for the documents and buildings of his reign bear chiefly an Egyptian complexion, and the Greek remains, literary and otherwise, seem to grow scantier.

We may infer, then, that the main idea of Philadelphus—the incorporating of Egypt, as a mere feeder of Alexandria, into the Hellenistic fringe of the Eastern Mediterranean, turned out a failure; and so it is that the hymns composed by his laureate to promote this policy advocate a failing cause. For they were written to celebrate Greek feasts at shrines to which the king had sent precious gifts and favours, and under cover of the worship to laud the greatness and generosity of the King of Egypt. The adroit allusions to Ptolemy in these hymns are not mere flattery—they are intended to commend to the people of Argos, Delos, Ephesus, Cnidos, as well as to the many Greeks assembled at Alexandria, the benefits of a close alliance with, if not of submission to, the throne of Egypt. But, as has been observed by critics, we gain no agreeable picture of the king from his panegyrist. His power, his wisdom, his liberality, his victories over his enemies, are lauded, but there is nothing estimable or lovable told by the poet.¹

It is almost amusing by what strained inferences he is made out one of the champions of Hellenism against the wild and barbarous Celts. In the great conflict which gained Antigonus the throne and Antiochus his title (Soter), Ptolemy had taken no part. Possibly he had been invited to help, and had looked on with traitorous indifference at the straits of his rivals and brother kings; but he presently did not scruple to engage from Antigonus some thousands of the savages against his relative, Magas, the dynast of Cyrene. These mercenaries formed, or were said to have formed, plans for seizing Egypt, so they were enticed into an island in mid-stream of the Nile, and in this prison, from which there was no escape, they were all killed or perished. This is the history which Callimachus, in his fourth hymn (171-188), identifies with the great defeat of the Celts at Delphi, and the heroic defence of the passes of Ætolia. Fortunately the real facts are preserved to us in a scholion on the passage, and so we are saved many wild conjectures.

¹ The story of Josephus, above mentioned (p. 207), about his attending the artist's workshops instead of doing more serious business, is, if true, more agreeable, but not inconsistent with what is said in the text.

The flattery in the second hymn (to Apollo) is even more portentous, for it is clear that the whole description of the attributes of the god is intended to apply to the now aging king, the founder of great cities, the healer of plagues, the source of wealth and prosperity. The poet even insinuates that the king is immortal, and has discovered that elixir of life which he long sought with pertinacious hope.¹

But as regards the composition, there can be no doubt that the opening of the poem, with its agitation and excited address, is the best and most lyrical passage in all the hymns.

οἶον ὁ τῷ 'πόλλωνος ἐσείσατο δάφνινος ὄρπηξ, οἶα δ' ὄλον τὸ μέλαθρον / ἐκάς, ἐκάς, ὅς τις ἀλιτρός /
καὶ δῆπου τὰ θύρετρα καλῶ ποδὶ φοῖβος ἀράσσει.
οὐχ ὀράας; ἐπένευσεν ὁ Δήλιος ἠδύ τι φοῖνιξ ἐξαπίνης, ὁ δὲ κύκνος ἐν ἡέρι καλὸν αἶδει. κ.τ.λ.

This character, which is also seen at the opening of Hymn VI. (to Demeter), is by no means so prominent in them as that of epical narrative, if indeed that can be called epical which appears so frequently in the Odes of Pindar. I mean an episode in the legends of the god or hero told for the purpose of magnifying his power, and warning mortals against disobedience. The most remarkable and developed of these narratives in Callimachus are those of the misfortune of Tiresias, who surprised Athene when bathing (v. 57-136), and the story of Erysichthon, doomed to perpetual hunger for his insolence to Demeter. The latter story, written in Doric dialect for the benefit of the Dorians who assembled to honour Demeter at the sanctuary on the Triopian promontory (near Cnidus), is distinctly comic in tone, and reminds us strongly of the idylls of Theocritus. Had it come down to us under that poet's name, it is likely that it would have attained to modern fame. For the narrative is very clever and poetical, while the humour of the thing is admirable. I will quote it in the Appendix (B), as it is a pity that so remarkable a specimen of Alexandrian poetry should be laid aside in oblivion.

¹ Athen. p. 536, E.

This is the more to be regretted as the faults—and they are many—of Callimachus are well known, and often cited, perhaps at second (or more likely tenth) hand, to justify our complete neglect of this literature. We hear a great deal of his pedantry, of his lack of taste, of his love of detail at the wrong moment, of his want of a just sense of what is lofty and dignified. Thus Apollo prophesying to his mother before he is born offends us justly, and even where the verses are graceful something jars upon us, as in the passage where he describes the frightening of youthful goddesses when they are naughty by the threat of the Bogy Cyclops, acted by Hermes blackened with soot.

οὐ νέμεσις · κείνους δὲ καὶ αἱ μάλα μηκέτι τυτθαῖ οὐδεποτ' αφρικτὶ μακάρων ὀρώσι θύγατρες · ἀλλ' ὅτε κουράων τὶς ἀπειθέα μητέρι τεύχοι, μήτηρ μὲν Κύκλωπας ἐῖ ἐπὶ παιδὶ καλιστρῆι, Ἄργην ἢ Στερόπην · ὁ δὲ δώματος ἐκ μυχάτοιο ἔρχεται Ἑρμείης, σποδιῇ κεχρημένος αἰθῇ.

These defects did not prevent Catullus, Ovid, Vergil, and Horace from making Callimachus their model in many things, and surely the judgment of these first-rate poets, who had before them all the wealth of Greek literature, may well counterbalance the contempt of modern critics.

The last point I will here note about these hymns is, however, for our purpose the most important. What view of the religion of his day does Callimachus give us? As I said before, he was the Coryphæus of the great reaction towards Greece which Philadelphus had learned from his Greek tutors. The great ritual, the mysticism, the pantheism of the old Egyptian priests were perfectly unknown to him. He never thought for one moment of learning what they had to say upon the problems of the universe. Had he lived when the court felt compelled to build great temples to Khonsu and Horus and Isis, we need hardly have expected more than polite allusions to the fashionable policy of his paymasters. He was more concerned with discovering and retailing obscure local myths about the fading gods of Greece,¹ with explaining their obsolete epithets, and disseminating their often scandalous adventures, than in seizing upon the great new truths which were then being born into the world.

It was with the university of Alexandria as with other well-established and endowed universities. Formal orthodoxy was its policy—orthodoxy, because many centuries had so accumulated myth and dogma that theology was a welcome and inexhaustible field to the learning of the pedant, to learning without originality; formal too, like that of the Cinquecento, for the learned would not deny themselves the pleasure or the liberty of sneering at earnest faith, and ridiculing the intellectual weaknesses of the faithful. These fellows and professors of the Hellenistic university were, in fact, orthodox because they were not religious, and because they preferred explaining religion as interesting archæology to adopting it as a rule of life. Like the pedants of our own day, the greatest crime they knew was not to have done wrong, but to have made a blunder, to have been caught copying when they posed as original, to be outdone by a literary rival when they had laid down the laws of literary taste. All this is irreligious in the deepest sense, and so we find the hymns of Callimachus no better than those modern prayers which are, in fact, 'oblique sermons,' and one of which was even reported to be the most eloquent ever addressed to a Boston congregation.

¹ Perhaps better than any of Callimachus's hymns is that of Theocritus to Castor and Pollux (Id. xxii.), which is very dramatic, even introducing character dialogue, and narrating with great effect a famous episode in the acts of Pollux.

How differently does the extant hymn to Jove of the Stoic Cleanthes affect us, especially if we compare with it the other scanty fragments left us by that famous philosopher! We may be sure that the Alexandrian literati found plenty of faults in its composition, and thought their own researches into the myths of Jove's birth, marriages, and adventures far more elegant and poetical. But we, who live apart from the controversies of that day, see in Cleanthes's famous hymn a splendid attempt to bring into harmony the author of nature with the traditional Zeus, and Divine providence with his will. There is no attempt to discredit orthodoxy, but rather to purify it, and use its elements of truth for a moral purpose. He prays, too, not for further learning to understand the stories of Zeus, but for further moral understanding wherewith to feel and appreciate the laws of God and the ways of providence in the ruling of the world. I may conclude with the text.

Κύδιστ' ἀθανάτων, πολυνύμε, παγκρατὲς αἰεὶ
 Ζεῦ, φύσεως ἀρχηγέ, νόμου μέτα πάντα κυβερνῶν, χαῖρε· σὲ γὰρ πάντεσσι θέμις θνητοῖσι προσαυδᾶν.
 Ἐκ σοῦ γὰρ γένος ἐσμέν, ἐνὸς μίμημα λαχόντες
 μοῦνον, ὅσα ζῶει τε καὶ ἔρπει θνήτ' ἐπὶ γαῖαν.
 Τῇ σε καθυμνήσω, καὶ σὸν κράτος αἰὲν αἰείσω.
 Σοὶ δὴ πᾶς ὁδε κόσμος ἐλισσόμενος περὶ γαῖαν πείθεται, ἥ κεν ἄγῃς, καὶ ἐκὼν ὑπὸ σείῳ κρατεῖται· τοῖον ἔχεις ὑποεργὸν ἀνικῆτοῖς ἐνὶ χερσὶν ἀμφήκη, πυρόεντα, αἰεζώοντα κεραυνόν.
 Τοῦ γὰρ ὑπὸ πληγῆς φύσεως πάντ' ἐρρίγασιν, ᾧ σὺ κατευθύνεις κοινὸν λόγον, ὃς διὰ πάντων φοιτᾷ, μιγνύμενος μεγάλοις μικροῖς τε φάεσσιν, ὥς τόσσος γεγαῶς, ὕπατος βασιλεὺς διὰ παντός.
 Οὐδέ τι γίγνεται ἔργον ἐπὶ χθονὶ σοῦ δίχα, δαῖμον, οὔτε κατ' αἰθέριον θεῖον πόλον, οὔτ' ἐνὶ πόντῳ,
 πλὴν ὅποσα ῥέζουσι κακοὶ σφετέρησιν ἀνοίαις.
 Ἀλλὰ σὺ καὶ τὰ περισσὰ ἐπίστασαι ἄρτια θεῖναι,
 καὶ κοσμεῖν τὰ ἄκοσμα, καὶ οὐ φίλα σοὶ φίλα ἐστίν.
 Ὡδε γὰρ εἰς ἓν ἅπαντα συνήρמוκας ἐσθλὰ κακοῖσιν,
 ὥσθ' ἓνα γίγνεσθαι πάντων λόγον αἰὲν ἐόντα,
 ὃν φεύγοντες ἐῷσιν ὅσοι θνητῶν κακοί εἰσι, δύσμοροι, οἳ τ' ἀγαθῶν μὲν αἰεὶ κτῆσιν ποθέοντες οὔτ' ἐσορῶσι θεοῦ κοινὸν νόμον, οὔτε κλύουσιν, ᾧ κεν πειθόμενοι σὺν νῷ βίον ἐσθλὸν ἔχοιεν.
 Αὐτοὶ δ' αὖθ' ὀρμῶσιν ἄνευ καλοῦ ἄλλος ἐπ' ἄλλα,
 οἱ μὲν ὑπὲρ δόξης σπουδὴν δυσέριστον ἔχοντες,
 οἱ δ' ἐπὶ κερδοσύνας τετραμμένοι οὐδενὶ κόσμῳ,
 ἄλλοι δ' εἰς ἄνεσιν καὶ σώματος ἡδέα ἔργα,
 σπεύδοντες μάλα πάμπαν ἐναντία τῶνδε γενέσθαι.
 Ἀλλὰ Ζεῦ πάνδωρε, κελαινεφές, ἀρχικέραυνε, ἀνθρώπους ῥύοιο ἀπειροσύνης ἀπὸ λυγρῆς, ἣν σύ, πάτερ, σκέδασον ψυχῆς ἄπο, δὸς δὲ κυρῆσαι γνώμης, ἥ πίσυνος σὺ δίκης μέτα πάντα κυβερνῇς, ὅφρ' ἂν τιμηθέντες ἀμειβώμεσθά σε τιμῇ,

ὑμνοῦντες τὰ σὰ ἔργα διηνεκές, ὥς ἐπέοικε θνητὸν ἔόντ', ἐπεὶ οὔτε βροτοῖς γέρας ἄλλο τι μείζον, οὔτε θεοῖς, ἧ κοινὸν αἰὲ νόμον ἐν δίκη ὑμνεῖν.

This is worth far more than Alexandrian learning, and this alone would redeem the Hellenistic age as it now stands before us from the charge of mere artificiality and pedantry.

CHAPTER XII

ALEXANDRIAN LITERATURE — continued

THE EPICS OF ALEXANDRIA—APOLLONIUS, RHIANUS, ETC. —In the scanty records which remain to us we have news of a great literary quarrel, lasting for years, between Callimachus and his rival Apollonius, commonly called Rhodius. It was a quarrel not only as to the respective excellence of their work, but still more as to the principles or rather the possibilities of Alexandrian poetry—Apollonius seeking to revive the ancient epic poem, with its large content and deliberate narrative of mythical adventure, while Callimachus thought the day for such things was past, and that the latter-day poetry of Greece should be in short pieces, in occasional odes, idylls, and epigrams ; if in epics at all, in epics of an idyllic and homely character.

The leisure of life was gone, and the taste for enjoying quiet pleasures. Men were impatient in their recreations as well as in their labours. For who now would sit down and read through the Republic of Plato? The later philosophers felt this, and, enormously prolific as they were in writing, they published nothing but short tracts and pamphlets, to judge from the gigantic lists of their separate works.

It is certain that a self-conscious and artificial age in literature shows its weaknesses by violent admirations and dislikes, by cliques and partisanships, by anxious assertions of originality and bitter accusations of plagiarism. The work of a friend, of the head of a school, of an influential professor, is lauded from fear of his displeasure, from desire of his approval, as well as from real over-appreciation of his merits; and the work of rivals or opponents is decried from analogous motives. The loves and hates in the criticisms given to us by Mr. Swinburne are perhaps the most obvious instance of purely literary extravagance in such an age. To point to salient instances of the worse sort of literary jealousies or of literary adulation would hardly be excusable, however apt and valuable the illustration might be. This was clearly the temper of the literary hencoops of Alexandria, where over-fed and idle savants spent their time in criticising rather than in producing. They were evidently to be divided broadly into the usual classes of conservatives and innovators, those who admired and sought to emulate the ancients, and those who thought the age and its temper had changed, and that other days demand another Muse. Homer, indeed, held a peculiar and unique place at the head of Greek literature, and though there were not wanting bold spirits like Zoilus, who thought him absurdly overrated, they were mere outsiders, like the stray atheist in a believing age, when his intellectual vagaries are regarded as moral offences. Homer was the Bible of the Greeks, to most of them verbally inspired, and containing all kinds of perfect wisdom. But to imitate him would, on that very account, have been as absurd as to imitate the old sacred books of any nation. Hence the literary models of the Alexandrian school were rather Hesiod, with his plain didactic manner and his wealth of mythological lore; Mimnermus, perhaps, as the father of the sentimental elegy, but far more Antimachus of Colophon, who combined love with learning, regret with research, and so as it were possessed the perfections of both Hesiod and Mimnermus combined. But above all things the new school felt that the length of the old epic and tragic poems was unsuited to an age of hurry and of idleness, of satiety and thus of the impatience that comes of weariness. To them 'a big book was a big nuisance.' If heroic subjects were to be treated, as they must be, in every learned age, it must be in short pictures, in epic idylls, where an episode was given in picturesque detail, but without weariness to the reader.

We have seen a similar change of taste in our own day. Such a poem as Milton's Paradise Lost, despite its acknowledged greatness, finds few voluntary readers nowadays, and no modern poet in England would venture to appear as an epic poet in that form. His work might be praised indeed, but would certainly not be read. At the same time there is a taste abroad for mediæval romances, for the heroic lays of a simpler society. How does our poet-laureate satisfy these apparently conflicting conditions? Instead of giving us a long epic on the life of Launcelot, he selects passages from the prose romance, and gives them to us in highly-wrought pictures, entitled with the strictest propriety Idylls or short pictures. The word has been associated by us so closely with Theocritus, that it has now a pastoral connotation, and an idyll seems to exclude epic grandeur and heroic character. But such an accident only obscures the history of the word. We have among the idylls of Theocritus epic poems, both in subject and style, such as the meeting of Pollux and Amycus in combat, which are as like in character to Lord Tennyson's idylls as possible for poems of twenty centuries apart.

The leader of this modern school at Alexandria was certainly Callimachus, as we know both from his own allusions and those of his rivals. But he naturally did not persuade all literary Alexandria. For there were those who still believed in the possibility of great sustained compositions, who thought that the old inspiration was not extinct, and that if heroic subjects were still highly popular, they should be clothed in their antique dress, and brought out with the calm dignity of epic narrative. The leader of this tendency was at one moment Apollonius, a younger pupil of Callimachus. With the boldness and inexperience of youth, he read out to the fastidious, censorious public, long educated by Callimachus, parts of a great poem on the adventures of the Argonauts, hoping by this publication to obtain the popular verdict for his great reform in poetry. But the Callimacheans were far too strong for him. They covered him with ridicule and crushed him with criticism. He replied with sarcasm and invective, but was obliged to retire to Rhodes, where he spent years in polishing and rehandling his Argonautics, which in the end were received with favour, when Callimachus was long dead, when their author had succeeded to the post of his old master, and was even by the gentle irony of fortune laid beside him in his tomb. This great literary quarrel exercised all Alexandria in its day, and gave rise to many bitter epigrams and polemical writings.¹ If Callimachus censured the Argonautics, Apollonius ridiculed the Aetia, and the older poet must have felt the opposition to be very serious when he not only had recourse to the legitimate argument of composing a modern epic to show what he could do himself, but to the scandalous weapon of personal and scurrilous abuse.

His positive essay in epic poetry was the Hecale, a very famous work, of which the plot has been reconstructed with singular ingenuity by Näke, but of which only scraps and single words remain. His satire was contained in the Ibis, a poem copied, we do not know how closely, by Ovid in the extant Ibis, and certainly full of gall and bitterness. To judge from the curious errors of taste in Callimachus's religious poetry, we may assume his controversy to have been exceedingly coarse.

¹ I refer the reader for a fuller discussion to the last chapter of Couat's Poésie alexandrine, who has explored this special but very characteristic passage in Hellenistic literature.

The loss of the Hecale is far more deplorable, as this was the best specimen of the idyllic epic, or epic idyll, devised and produced by the Alexandrian school. Hecale was a poor old woman, living in a cabin in Attica, to whom the youthful Theseus comes tired and hungry, on his way to contend with the Marathonian bull. The old woman, full of garrulous hospitality, prepares his supper while telling him of the varied misfortunes of her obscure life, and sends him forth with anxious prayers and good wishes on his adventurous expedition. When he returns in triumph he finds the neighbours engaged upon her funeral, and, full of pity and grateful remembrance, he celebrates in splendid obsequies the virtues so long obscured by the hardships of poverty. This poem, while satisfying on the one hand the learned instincts of the day, in expounding a rather obscure myth about Theseus, and giving the origin of the Attic feast Hecalesia, on the other contained those homely pictures of daily life, those photographs, as we now say, of human nature, which have been so often popular in art. It is the ῥωπογραφία of later Greek painting, the school of Teniers or of Hogarth in older days, of the character novel in our own. The most perfect specimen we have is probably the famous sketch of the Syracusan women at the feast of Adonis in Theocritus's fifteenth poem. But while Theocritus here reproduces actual life, Callimachus, as indeed Theocritus elsewhere, lays the scene in heroic times. We must go back to the Electra of Euripides to find anything like it in any older extant poetry.¹

Such then were the theory and practice of Callimachus, Theocritus, and the most brilliant of the Alexandrians as regards epic poetry. But while almost everything famous which they produced is long dead and gone, the poem of Apollonius, which Callimachus so earnestly strove to destroy, has survived. Next to the works of Theocritus it is perhaps the least forgotten—I will not say the best known—of the poems of that age, and though it more properly belongs to a later generation, it is so closely connected with the schools and tastes of Philadelphus, the phil-Hellene par excellence of the Ptolemies, that we may best consider it here. In my Greek Literature I have already given a short account of this considerable epic, and shall therefore rather supplement what is there said than repeat myself here. I may add that Apollonius is the most accessible of these Alexandrians, having been in this century edited with the very full and instructive Greek scholia, first by Wellauer, then by Merkel, with excellent Prolegomena.

There is a very general agreement among intelligent critics as to the merits and demerits of the Argonautics. No one who has studied the age can fail to remark that both in topics and in style the poet is the child of his day, and that at no age of Greek literature were men more absolutely dominated by the fashion of the moment. Taking up the famous legend of the Quest of the Golden Fleece, which had been in the mouth of every poet who treated Greek legends,² Apollonius thought that by gathering together the brief and fragmentary episodes, and building them into an epic of adventure, he could renew the glory of the old masters. But, as was sure to be the case, he believed too little and knew too much. The gods in his poem are only lay figures, with the manners of Hellenistic courts, and the appearance of famous statues or pictures. They really do not dominate the action, nor is the reason for the expedition, the old legend concerning Phrixus and his descendants, brought forward with enough clearness to justify the action. Thus the poem degenerates from a great moral or religious mission into a story of piratical adventure. But even here Apollonius halts between two opinions. Instead of delighting us with pictures of strange lands and curious people, instead of a poetical anabasis, like the great work of Xenophon, through remote and barbarous peoples, he feels tied down by his mythological lore, and will only describe to us the heroes and people for whom he has antiquarian authority. This it is which gives the character of a mosaic to most of his work; he is too learned and too anxious to show his learning. He asserts that he has authority for every statement, and seems even painfully afraid of being taxed with originality of plot.

¹ Cf. my Hist. of Gk. Lit. i. 360.

² See the list enumerated by Couat, p. 301, which includes almost every great poet from Homer to Euripides, and moreover Callimachus.

It was the day of romantic foreign adventure. India, China, Arabia, Abyssinia were being opened to commerce, and we know from the Greek novels and the romances about Alexander that the Hellenistic public had acquired a keen taste for this kind of romantic adventure. Apollonius therefore so far missed his opportunity. The complicated geography of his fourth book—the return of the heroes—is the geography of the seventh century B.C., not of the third. It is based upon old and dim legends, not on real discovery. The voyage up the Ister (Danube) into the Po (Eridanus), and so into the Sicilian Sea, is too monstrous to be received with anything but amusement. But the poet felt bound to insert all the episodes given by previous poets, who had each treated the expedition from some special point of view, and with no desire of harmony. Accordingly he felt bound to bring the Argonauts round the fabulous north to Libya on their way home, and has neglected the modern wonders of the world for the very stale curiosities of antiquated logographers.

A more serious defect was entailed by this plan of composing a learned mosaic of adventure. It was impossible to subordinate all this disjointed action to the unity of character which makes an epic hero. Jason, instead of dominating the whole plot of the poem, is as much the plaything of the circumstances as John Inglesant in the recent novel of Mr. Shorthouse. The hero is by no means the leader of men. He is really inferior to many of his followers, and is only superior to them in his dress and his good fortunes. This is indeed the case with Agamemnon in the Iliad, but then Achilles is the real hero of that poem, whereas there is no other character in the Argonautics who can take this place. Heracles is dropped out by an intentional accident, as being too great for a second part. Still the later Greeks had been accustomed by Euripides to second-rate heroes along with first-rate heroines. Such is the poet's treatment of this very hero, Jason, in his famous Medea, for all through his plays he seems to have been unable to draw a great male character, whereas many of his heroines—Alcestis, Macaria, Iphigenia—are not only unsurpassed in heroism, but specially contrasted with weaker men.¹

This leads us to the great episode of the poem, and one which will always give it a high place in its age; an episode, moreover, of distinctively Alexandrian character, so that the spirit of the age redeems on one side what it had damaged on the other. If the geography of the Argonautics is its dullest side, there can be no doubt that the passion of Medea is its greatest and essentially Alexandrian feature. Euripides had long since painted the jealous fury of her disappointment; it was left for Apollonius to treat the far more interesting romance of her nascent passion for Jason, and the great struggle of the maiden with the woman, of patriotism with passion, of duty with lawlessness, in the fiery princess.

¹ Cf. my Hist. of Gk. Lit. i. 385.

There is no greater picture of this eternal romance in literature, and had the poet been content to produce it as a short epic, after the manner of Callimachus and Theocritus, it would doubtless have become as famous as the passion of Dido. The remainder of the Æneid is indeed far superior to the remainder of the Argonautics, and therefore deserved better to live, but how many thousands are there who have read the love and death of Dido and who have no interest in the rest of the poem. Moreover, as we know of no model for the Medea of Apollonius, so we know of no model which can have inspired Vergil but this very episode. He was very intimate with Apollonius, as with all Alexandrian poetry, and it was here that he sought that profound and pathetic psychology which appeals to the sympathy of every age. The Acontius and Cydippe, which we have already described, gave the common everyday version of the drama, which reaches into the poorest and most trivial life. Apollonius raised it from melodrama to tragedy, and yet a quite different tragedy from that of Euripides, whose Medea and Phædra have no touch of the virgin purity which the Alexandrians felt to be the necessary starting-point of the love romance in a refined society.

There is indeed, as there is in Vergil, much of the conventionality of the age. If in other respects the literary men of the day were godless, and the interference of Zeus and Here in the acts of men was only a survival in Hellenistic poetry, love affairs were always represented under the guise of the will of Kypris and the arrows of Eros. The mischievous urchin never fails to be present, and to shoot his dart into the heart of youth or maiden. The Alexandrians could no more construct a story without this assistance than the Renaissance lay out a garden without its Tritons and its Cupids. This is the source of the same feature in Vergil, and is one of the many cases where conventionalism takes its place beside real and earnest pictures of life, and must be accepted as resulting from the relativity of art in every age. There is in fact no age, especially no cultivated age, without its peculiar anachronisms, which we pass over as immaterial to the great truths which form the real body, and not the dress and fashion of art. The quaintnesses and conceits of certain societies are graceful, of others not so, and perhaps the Alexandrians, in spite of Theocritus, were wanting in picturesqueness. But they understood the great passion of life with no lack of insight, and have left us a picture of it which must rank among the great things which the world of letters has achieved.

If then this episode might belong to any epoch among men, it is not less distinctly Alexandrian than those lesser features which many critics have noticed. There is the melancholy, almost the despondency, felt in a weary time at the many troubles of life, that world-sadness of which Euripides shows the earliest traces among the Greeks. There is also that preference of politics to violence, of diplomacy to force, which appears not only in the speech of Æetes, but in the meeting of the goddesses, who hide bitter enmity under a garb of politeness. The gods indeed become more and more like Hellenistic sovereigns, living at a court like that of the Ptolemies, and cloaking their absolutism with excuses of policy. The conflicts of the gods of Homer would have been unseemly beyond endurance to Alexandrian taste.

There is one feature which the poet seems to me to have borrowed from the older tragedy, and that is the strength of will and determined action of Medea as compared with Jason. Not that her mind is at once made up; far from it. The remarkable point is that while the weaker Jason never hesitates except from fear, the agitation of Medea, the coming and going of her resolve, even the bursting into helpless tears, are preludes to the most determined and ruthless action. In the long interview with Jason that hero makes no advances, and merely lets his beauty tell on the maiden, who is smitten to the heart by Eros. It is she who has to propose every plan; it is she who flies alone and unsolicited through the night, and hails the ship to take her on board. It is she who, to defeat the various efforts made by her father to recover her, supplicates, upbraids, and ob-jurgates, while the heroes show her very lukewarm courtesy. This is truly the tragic feature in the story, that she who had saved them all, and restored them to their home from the certain vengeance of Æetes, should be the suppliant and the stranger among them.

Nor is the whole poem without a deep tinge of melancholy. No human joy is complete, no satisfaction without alloy. At the very moment of the consummation of happiness of the noble pair, while Orpheus and the nymphs are singing the bridal song around the nuptial car, the poet turns to his sadness. For with the peculiar chastity of Hellenistic love-stories, he had taken care to show that Medea's love was absolutely pure (iv. 1018 sq.), and that no temptation interfered with the very respectable plan adopted by both, that the princess should not be married to Jason till their return to Iolchos, where the ceremony could be performed with due solemnity (iv. 1161 sq.) But unfortunately on their reaching the court of Alcinous at Phæacia the Colchians were there to claim her, and queen Arete had sent the Argonauts word, that if she were still a virgin the king must decree her extradition to her father's envoys. Hence the marriage is made in haste, and with what circumstance was possible. But not a word is said of the sudden joy of Jason, of the eagerness of the lovers to attain the goal of their desires. No, nothing but the reflection that they were disappointed in their plan, that the nuptial night was celebrated in hurry and in fear, and that here as ever there is no such thing as perfect human joy.¹

I notice another very Hellenistic feature in the poem, which is the far-reaching policy of the kings, and the habit of cloaking their violences with diplomacy. Thus when Arete counsels Alcinous to neglect Æetes, because he is so far off, and favour their nearer neighbours in Thessaly, the king replies that this will never do, for in the first place no one is more kingly than the Colchian, and in the next however far off he can easily raise them up difficulties in Greece (1101-1103). The speeches of Æetes himself, given in indirect narration (iii. 579 sq.), are similarly, as M. Couat remarks, expositions of policy like the speeches in a Greek

¹ ἀλλὰ γὰρ οὐ ποτε φύλα δυνπαθέων ἀνθρώπων
τερπωλῆς ἐπέβημεν ὀλῶ ποδί · σὺν δέ τις αἰεὶ πικρὴ παρμέμβλωκεν εὐφροσύνησιν ἀνίη (iv. 1165).

So far from love being the γλυκύπικρον of other Alexandrian poets, he regards it as an unmixed pain—σχέτλι' ἔρωσ, μέγα πῆμα, μέγα στύγος ἀνθρώποισιν, ἐκ σέθεν οὐλόμεναι τ' ἔριδες στοναχαὶ τε γόοι τε ἀλγέα τ' ἀλλ' ἐπὶ τοῖσιν ἀπάονα τετρήχασι (iii. 445-447).

even the heroic epic cannot but be

The only other long epic of the the prose paraphrase of Pausanias, is Messenian war by Rhianus of Crete.
this famous war, and its splendid l forms the groundwork of far the mo:
old Greek history, and we cannot bu had made special researches into the ous cities, for selecting this truly epic wonderful conflict against superior fo but glorious defeat, the gradual closin iron hand of fate checking and annul all this, which the exiled Messenia national tradition, and revived with th under Epaminondas, was exalted by the epic, of which we cannot but regret evidences, not only in the prose of fragments left us of the poet, that his more flowing than that of his broth moreover touches in the story of Pau give us the actual treatment of Rh poetical. The dozen epigrams ascr Anthology show much grace and el

In default of any further evidence on the longer epics of the conservative school, though no doubt many more existed, such as, for example, that which I have conjectured Pausanias to have used on the invasion of the Celts,¹ I turn to the only extant and probably the best specimens of short epics, in the style of the Hecale, namely, those composed by Theocritus, and justly classed among his idylls. For I have already explained that any short and complete poem, dramatic or descriptive, or both (but not lyric), is justly called an idyll. These poems have of course been suspected by German critics, because they differ very widely from the bucolic idylls, and because they show great contrasts in their composition. As if every Alexandrian author had not aimed at this very thing! Let us look at some of them for a moment.

The most remarkable is the account of Heracles's visit to the stables of Augeas (Id. xxvi.), a poem of 280 lines, in which the hero's arrival, his colloquy with an old servant, his encounter with a bull that charges his lion's skin, and his own narrative of the affair of the Nemean lion to Augeas's son, who is struck with admiration of him, are all told with dramatic force and brevity. The work is essentially an epic idyll, complete so far as it goes, and evidently taken out of a longer legend, but requiring nothing more within itself. Hence it begins without a beginning and ends without an end.² Of course the pedants wish to supply a logical introduction and conclusion; they call it a fragment

¹ Above, p. 158.

² The opening is—

τὸνδ' ὁ γέρων προσέειπε, φυτῶν ἐπλούρος ἀροτρεὺς παυσάμενος ἔργοιο τό οἱ μετὰ χερσὶν ἔκειτο·

the arrival of Heracles and his previous history being taken for granted. The end is the end of Heracles's tale to the boy with whom he is walking through a narrow lane among the vines. This tale is in fact the purpose of the poem, which is thus justified.

of a longer poem. So I suppose, when future pedants come to edit Bret Harte's masterpiece, The Heathen Chinees, they will print '* * * * which I wish to remark,' and tell you that the opening of the poem is lost.

Hardly less characteristic is the twenty-fourth idyll on the prowess of the infant Heracles strangling the snakes sent against him by Juno. The domestic scene of Alcmena lulling the children to sleep in a great shield, presently the terror of the household, the screams of the mortal infant Iphitus, the hurry of Amphytrion with his sword, the attendants rushing in with lights, all this makes a picture unlike anything in Greek literature except the famous scene in the Hymn to Demeter.¹ The loss of Hylas on the Argonautic expedition, and the raging search of Heracles, form another like episode (xiii.) From these we acquire a clear notion of the kind of poem which Callimachus and his school set up as the modern model, against the long and pretentious epics of Apollonius and Rhianus.

If this, then, was the Alexandrian treatment of the epic style, we wish we could form some similar notion of what they did in tragedy. For they tell us of a Pleiad of splendid poets, fit successors of the great ancients, who came together to compose and produce plays at Alexandria.² The tragedies of these people are absolutely gone; we only hear a word or two of their satyric dramas, in which we know they ridiculed strict philosophers, such as Cleanthes and Menedemos; also a fragment from Dositheos's Daphnis has survived, and the use of recent historical subjects is shown by the Casandreans of Lycophron, above mentioned.¹ It seems to me that the Alexandrian tragedy as well as comedy was a much closer copy of the older schools than the literature we have been reviewing, and that for this very reason it presented no interest to succeeding critics. Whatever merit might be attained by an original development or fusion or modification of older kinds of poetry, a direct imitation of Sophocles or Euripides was sure to turn out a failure. The ridicule of living persons in a satyrical play shows that they had adopted features from the earlier comedy of Athens, especially the so-called Middle Comedy, but more than this our scanty information forbids us even to conjecture.

¹ Cf. my Gk. Lit. i. 135.

² Their names were Alexander the Ætolian, Philiskos of Corcyra, Dositheos of Alexandria in Troas, Homer of Caria, Æantides (all but his name unknown), Sosiphanes of Syracuse, and lastly Lycophron of Chalcis, of whom more presently. Not one of these men was Alexandrian by birth, probably owing to its recent settlement and its non-literary population; they were not even Cyrenæans like Callimachus. Nothing shows more clearly the great mixture of all kinds of Greeks found at Alexandria.

BUCOLIC POETRY.—We return now to Theocritus, whom we have already met in so many departments, to consider his greatest and most successful work, the pastoral idylls or bucolics, which have fascinated the world ever since. This and the romantic novel are in literature the everlasting heritage of that many-sided, over-active, and therefore unsuccessful age. They all attempted everything; in many things they apparently succeeded, but success of this kind often means ultimate failure. So the men who have been brilliant in many walks of life 'in their lifetime get their good things,' and are forgotten when the man who did one thing is praised and remembered.

There was no more thorough child of his age than Theocritus. He essayed every form of poetry then in fashion—short epics, elegiacs, hymns, encomia, epigrams, lyric poems in Æolic metres—but, like all his contemporaries,

¹ p. 159.

Homer. We have already spoken of epic story, which are indeed very good, not raise him above Callimachus. That of his official praises of Hiero and I while his hymns—a mere modification happens better, are not transcendent in safely assert that Theocritus would oblivion as Callimachus, Aratus, and not for his pastoral poems and dramas are little more than half the collection.
 his real vein, and enriched literature
 the alternate strains, or the monodies, their flocks, and in their otia dia reflect simplicity the transports, the regrets, the

There is very little character-painting or alternate strains, except so far as shepherds or goatherds are coarser than others.
 herds, Daphnis and Menalcas, are indeed level, and purify the passion of love in all these singers represent ordinary and common nature put into the circumstances of complete sympathy with the ordinary human nature. It is not the vast aspects.

naturally as possible ; and yet when we examine the work more closely we find it highly artificial, only of that highest art which perfectly simulates nature.

Theocritus was not a world-worn man who fled from the city and the court to live with simple men and forget his griefs in their innocent pursuits. He was all his life a court poet, seeking the favour and the pay of kings, joining in literary society, eminent among the savants of the museum. But he discovered a new taste wherewith to stimulate the jaded literary appetite of the pedants among the sandhills ; he had sufficient genius to avoid the excessive learning, the overloading details, the artificial vocabulary of his rivals, and he did it by taking refuge in a sphere where such things were excluded of necessity. He used all the devices of his school—enumerations of names, descriptions, exquisite metaphors—but he used them all with reserve and judgment. Thus his pastoral poems, for which we know no literary model, were justly hailed as a new departure in literature, and their delicate conceits, their artificial fancies, their studied simplicity, became the model first of the Romans, then of the Renaissance, then of Romanticism. Theocritus even led the fashion of disguising his literary friends under peasant names and shepherds' dress, and so we have from him no real information about Hellenistic ways and manners, though much as to Hellenistic literary taste. His pictures of pastoral life, so far as they were really taken from nature, were not Hellenistic, but universal to that kind of life ; and there is no traveller who wanders through Calabria, or Sicily, or the Cyclades, who does not report to us Theocritean scenes as of everyday occurrence. There are indeed large tracts of Arcadia and Argolis, of Laconia and Messenia, of Phocis and Bœotia, which were once peopled with cultivated cities, but which have now gone back into the pastoral stage, and are again peopled with the goatherds and neatherds of Theocritus, and resound with the same laughter and the same complaints. But this admirable portraiture of the universal features of southern peasant life has hidden from us what in this book we are striving to find, a picture of the particular ways and manners which distinguished the poet's age from other times. Concerning this he tells us no more than the most mythological and artificial of the Alexandrian poets. His encomium of Ptolemy is no better than those in the hymns of Callimachus, and very like them. It has the usual courtly exaggerations, the identifying of Ptolemy, his wife, and his parents, with the gods, the praise of his wealth, of the extent of his empire, and of his patronage of literature. As usual, there is a remarkable absence of goodness in his portrait of the king.

But there remains one exception to all this: the dramatic picture of a high feast-day at Alexandria, in which the first scene is the arrival of an Alexandrian woman in a friend's house in order that both women may go together and hear the celebrated prima donna sing the Adonis song. The household details, the toilette, the complaints about their husbands, the admiration of a new dress and its cost, the rough treatment of an awkward servant; then the crowd in the streets, the terror of the passing cavalry, the squeeze at the entrance, the saucy rejoinder to a stranger who protests against their incessant jabber—these and many other comic and picturesque details have made this poem the best known among the so-called idylls. It may, perhaps, have been taken directly from a mime of Sophron. But here again the features are quite universal; and this very universality makes the poem great in literature. Moreover, the poet has no further interest, no ulterior motive, than the faithfulness of his picture. He is not a satirist who cloaks his contempt for a rotten civilisation under the guise of admiration for rural simplicity. He is not a moral teacher who seeks to convey lessons of life in a dramatic form. He is not a pessimist out of humour with his surroundings. Theocritus probably thought with Callimachus that the age was the most brilliant and perfect the world had yet seen. It was, indeed, a late age, when many types and forms of literature were exhausted, and when originality was difficult owing to the great roll of poets who had gone before and essayed all the paths of song. But this only enhanced the glory of a new victory and the praise of new invention. Of all the men who claimed to have attained this lofty position, and whose claim was allowed by a critical and fastidious generation, Theocritus alone has stood the test of centuries. In Roman days Philetas, Callimachus, Aratus, were more celebrated and found wider acceptance. Now they have either been lost through want of readers, or might as well have been lost so far as the great majority of readers is concerned.

I pass for a moment to the last remaining poem of this prolific age, the strange and weird Alexandra (or Cassandra) of Lycophron. If Theocritus sought to represent ordinary life and language as closely as true art would permit, and succeeded by means of his admirable realism, surely Lycophron sought the very opposite way to fame, and strove to outdo his pedantic and artificial age by such a display of obscure myths clothed in obscure language as make his work a riddle and its explanation the arena of the scholiast. He seems to have sought his extraordinary vocabulary, as Mr. Bury tells me, in the out-of-the-way tragic diction, such as that of Sophocles, which abounded in odd ἀπαξ λεγόμενα, now preserved only in the Lexica. I have elsewhere commented on this feature in Sophocles.¹ The plot or plan of this production, which can hardly be called literature, is that a servant, set to watch Cassandra—who in some obscure legends was called Alexandra¹—by her father Priam, gives an account, in 1440 iambic trimeters, of the prophecies of the princess, which reach through the Trojan war and other early legends, with a notice of the first victories of the Romans. Indeed, the verses 1226-1280 and 1446-1450 make it very doubtful whether the poet is not, after all, a later Lycophron, writing after the final defeat of Philip V. of Macedon. If not, these passages are interpolated. But indeed it makes very little difference. The learned jargon in which the verses are composed is such that no Greek scholar, however accomplished, can read five lines without being puzzled; and, but for the paraphrases and full scholia extant in the Marcian MS., we might close the book at once as a hopeless riddle. If then the book be indeed by the Lycophron who wrote admired tragedies under Philadelphus, and drew the picture of the tyrant Apollodorus already mentioned (p. 159), we have a second instance, like that of Casander's pedant brother, of how far the search after recondite learning could carry a sensible man in that artificial age, which was striving so hard and so unsuccessfully after literary originality.

¹ Hist. Gk. Lit. i. 314.

We are now in a position to estimate the effect of Hellenism upon literature at Alexandria in the second generation of that city, and under the fostering care of Philadelphus. The reader will no doubt have been surprised at the quantity of poetry that is extant. I have only cited a few fragments, but if we were to sum up all these and the epigrams which belong to this generation, there appears a body of literature quite large enough to distinguish any age, and one which certainly had more influence on Roman literature than all that went before. Even when a poet like Vergil reproduces Homer and Hesiod, we feel that he has approached them not directly but through the Alexandrian poets, through Aratus and Apollonius. It is their admiration, their treatment, which breathes through his work. These writers, therefore, affected posterity very materially; they even laid down the form of certain distinct branches of literary art which have lasted to the present day.

¹ This is mentioned by Pausanias, iii. 19, 6; 26, 5; who says she was so called in two places in Laconia, and worshipped at a shrine.

But when we turn to consider what effect this great outburst of book-writing had upon the culture of the day, on the education of the people, on the fusing of nations into the large unity of Hellenistic civilisation, the answer is very unsatisfactory. All these learned men were attracted by Philadelphus to Egypt, a country with an old and splendid culture, with magnificent monuments, with an established clergy holding the traditions of an ancient history and literature. They stood face to face with what Pythagoras and Plato and Herodotus had admired as the fountainhead of the world's philosophy and the world's religion. Now was the time, if they indeed loved research, to have all things translated, interpreted, and made Hellenistic property. A beginning had been made, probably under Ptolemy Soter, by Manetho's Greek account of the Egyptian dynasties, and hence we might fairly have expected other translations to follow, like the LXX. version of the Jewish books. But alas! this good beginning bore no fruit. In all the books we have reviewed there is hardly a mention of Egypt, or if so, merely as a rich possession of Ptolemy, giving him power and glory among Hellenistic sovereigns. Apollonius once alludes to the conquests of Sesostris, as a sort of prototype for the conquests of Ptolemy. Theocritus speaks of the 33,333 cities of Egypt under his sway. The scientific men seem to have collected the curious fauna and flora of this sub-tropical climate. But Aratus will not even describe the constellations of the Egyptian heavens, much less give us any account of the remarkable observations and calendar of the Egyptian priests. They all seem dead to any notion of fusing Greek and Egyptian culture, or explaining the old mythical history of Greece and Asia Minor by any records from the hieroglyphics.

I look upon this melancholy and stupid neglect as mainly the fault of the second Ptolemy. His father brought him up very carefully in Greek culture, as a Macedonian soldier, the companion of Alexander, was sure to do. He sought for him the best Greek teachers, like those of Alexander, and we know that he was acting under the advice of an Attic philosopher when he founded his university. It was these people, with their overweening national pride and their contempt of all else as barbarian, who so warped the young king's mind that he sought to make Alexandria a Greek capital, with Egypt behind it as a mere source of revenue. The Egyptians, as we have already seen, were declared, with curious short-sightedness, politically inferior to the Græco-Macedonian invaders. The administrator of Egyptian affairs according to Egyptian law, was even openly styled πράκτωρ τῶν ξενικῶν, the 'foreign agent' for the Ptolemaic government—a bitter insult, as well as the symbol of a stupid and ignorant policy. The whole attention of poets, of historians, of politicians, was directed not to Egypt but to Greece and the Levant. The Dons of the museum spent their time in raking up the myths and mythologies of obscure villages in Arcadia, the local cults of Attica or the Troad, in fact, all the idle and defunct trivialities of Greek legendary lore, instead of drawing from the great stream which brought to their gates the wisdom and the learning of countless generations of culture. We hear of rich offerings and temples dedicated by Philadelphus at Olympia, at Samothrace, at Cos, at Rhodes, but hardly an inscription, and only a single temple,¹ among the splendid monuments of the Ptolemies in Egypt, witnesses to any living interest taken by the king in the people that supplied him with his wealth. He posed as the most Hellenic of kings in the most non-Hellenic of countries. The literature he patronised was that of a strange country, and even there of bygone generations. It had no living contact with the Greeks, far less with the Egyptians. Thus his reign seems to me to have been a deliberate reversal of the Greek lessons taught by Alexander, and a return to the stupid advice of Aristotle to treat the Greeks (and Macedonians)—ἡγεμονικῶς—as a leader, the ‘barbarians’—δεσποτικῶς—as a master.

We know that the reaction came. When we look to the monuments of the next king, Euergetes, we find the inscription of Canopus reverting to the policy of Soter in the document above cited (p. 176), and giving privileges and benefits to the national religion. But the protocol is no longer in hieroglyphics alone, but in hieroglyphics, in demotic, and in Greek. We find, moreover, many great temples built by him throughout Egypt to Egyptian gods, and so thoroughly Egyptian in style that till the inscriptions were read it required all the genius of Letronne to sustain the very improbable thesis that Hellenistic Ptolemies should have built purely Egyptian architecture. Yet such proved to be the case. Egypt is now covered with these remains. Not only at Karnak, beside the older and more splendid work, but upon old sites, such as Esneh, Edfu, and Denderah, the Egyptian reaction shows itself complete, and the Ptolemies figure with Pshent and Uræus, with winged disk and crook of life, with cartouched name and pictured titles, the literal descendants of the ancient Pharaohs.

¹ Perhaps he began the great temple of Isis at Philæ, in the monolithic granite shrine of which there is a representation of him suckled by Isis.

All this perfectly natural and necessary history was balked and delayed by Philadelphus, who severed completely Greek and Egyptian culture, made no attempt to draw Egyptians into his Museum, and allowed them to develop that hatred for Greek manners and religion which prohibited any wholesome fusion of ideas, and resulted in a series of dangerous revolutions among the people. The priestly caste kept all its knowledge sullenly to itself, and dried up more and more into rigid formalism. The pedants of the Museum confined themselves to Greek learning and Greek interests, and so stood apart, a learned caste, with no national feeling to support them.

Thus, so far as I can see, the first great attempt at the fusion of races, the first essay in Hellenism, was a failure so far as the policy of the leading personage of the day could affect it.

The laborious investigations of Droysen into the Hellenistic colonies of this century lead to a similar result. While the Seleucids founded some forty cities in Upper Syria between Antioch and the Tigris, so that the whole country became interpenetrated with Hellenistic politics, using the Greek tongue and endowed with the largest communal independence, we find the new cities of the Lagidæ as a rule beyond the bounds of Egypt, and rather outposts of influence in foreign lands than centres for the propaganda of Hellenism. Thus a town called Arsinoe was founded by Philadelphus in Ætolia, another in Crete, another, indeed several towns, in Cilicia and Pamphylia, as well as a series of sea-coast settlements down the Red Sea, but in Egypt itself only two, Ptolemais¹ in Upper Egypt, near Thebes, and Arsinoe on Lake Moëris. We hear that in other Egyptian towns the Greeks lived in their separate quarters, and under separate privileges. The outposts on the Red Sea as far as Adule, and perhaps as Aden, were intended for elephant hunting, and to protect the ship traffic from India in that dangerous sea, full of shoals and currents, and infested with pirates; nor do we hear that any of these settlements, which are mostly attributed to Philadelphus, were meant to civilise the people, or to bring them into a more settled method of life.

¹ This Ptolemais was, no doubt, a thoroughly Greek town, to judge from the establishment there of a society of dramatic artists, such as were common in Greece, and will be described hereafter. Cf. Miller in Bull. de Corr. hell. ix. 2, 132. But excavations on this site are only commencing.

CHAPTER XIII

THE CITY LIFE OF THE THIRD CENTURY B.C., AND ITS EFFECTS UPON THE CIVILISATION OF THE AGE

As regards Alexandria and its ways, we only know from all the books we have quoted that its great population was distinguished into very separate societies. At the head of all was a luxurious and dissolute court, whose deified head allowed himself amours with public courtesans, which were notorious and not censured. The royal princesses had immense power, and kept great state. I infer from the description of Iris's duties in Callimachus¹ that they had maids of honour in attendance night and day to carry out instantly their behests. They often went out in state, when we may be sure the populace was compelled to stand very respectfully out of the way, and keep silence even from good words. On the other hand, court poets like Callimachus were allowed to speak with strange license of the most intimate relations in the royal household; and indeed all through Alexandrian society great freedom of manners prevailed. Women of the lower classes commonly went to shows and festivals, and spoke with freedom to men in the crowd. They all spoke Greek, though of various dialects, seeing that there were recent settlers from all Hellenedom in various quarters of the town. The second idyll of Theocritus even represents to us a young unmarried woman, living alone with her maid in her own house, and going out to see processions, where she falls in love with a handsome stranger. The streets, indeed, were full of women and children, in wide contrast to the habits of Hellenic towns. Then there was a large and wealthy mercantile society, with relations reaching from Italy to India, of which we know no details. The 'Macedonians,' or soldier class, we shall meet again. How far the Jews belonged to the merchants, and how far they were yet another class apart, it is now impossible to say. There remains to be enumerated the highest intellectual class, the people of the Museum, who counted as a sort of appendage to the court, and the mass of artizans and day-labourers, whom we may presume to have been Egyptians. These last, admitted to no rank or emolument, were nevertheless powerful by their numbers; they and the Jews supplied the mob of Alexandria; and we know that this mob had gloomy and cruel fits, which made the politer cities of the world look down upon it with dislike or disgust.

¹ Hymn. Del. 217 sq.—Iris comes in panting to tell the news that Latona has been received in Delos, and that her children are born. 'She spake, and sat down below the golden throne, like the hound of Artemis, which, when the goddess rests from her swift hunting, sits by her feet, and its ears are ever erect, ready to catch her exciting voice (ὁμοκλήν). So did the daughter of Thaumas (Iris) sit below the throne; and she is never oblivious of her station, not even when sleep presses her with oblivious wing, but leaning her head a little against the corner of the great throne she sleeps in a leaning posture; and never does she loose her girdle, or her swift running shoes, lest her mistress should give her a sudden order.' I do not think any earlier Greek poet would have drawn such a picture. If it describes, as I feel sure, Arsinoë's household, the social position of these maids of honour would be very interesting. Were they in the condition of slaves, or were they female relations of the king's Peers?

Asia Minor, which, in addition to this feature, had a new point in common, were all rapidly decaying. This was partly all the second-rate towns, which were political centres, such as Argos, the the Italiot and Sicilian towns except the famous cities of Asia Minor. The countries, which were now rapidly set cities in the first instance, so that the towns of Elis, and other well-known a population and of culture, sank down to be mere villages. The fighting men were man the large circuit of the walls, and in the wide thoroughfares. Such was the case with the ostentatious foundations of Epidaure and even Megalopolis, in spite of the decline of its career in this century.

For all this it would be distinctly true that life was yet decaying as a whole in the Hellenism. The very reverse is the case with the exceptions the centre of gravity shifted from the old to the new foundations, and men were better off as citizens of an Arsinoe or her not only material support from various kings, but the far greater advantage of being the recognised centre of philosophy in the world, to which outlying thinkers gravitated. The New Comedy, with its shallow spirit, was passing out of fashion, and the serious life of the philosophic schools taking its place. Political theorists were being trained at Athens who went forth to upset or restore the constitutions of their homes, to set up as tyrants or their destroyers, to break or to frame legal codes upon new principles. By a sort of tacit consent among the rulers of the world the city was allowed to proclaim its independence a few years after the Chremonidean war (about 250 B.C.), and the sentiment of the Hellenistic world was strong enough to protect this independence against the cupidity or ambition of powerful neighbours. To violate the territory of Athens became a sort of sacrilege, which set all respectable Hellenistic opinion against the invader, and in a polite and cultivated age, where sentiment counted for a great deal, this was a bulwark far stronger than ships and fortifications.

Here, then, was developed that critical idleness, that serious trifling, that earnest playing with great ideas, which is wont to gather round the real thinking of every great intellectual centre. The Athens of St. Paul, and even of Libanius, was practically the Athens reconstituted by the intellectual and moral forces now at work.

If we turn to the other focus of older Hellenedom, Sparta, we find a very different and a very curious picture. If Athens saved herself and prolonged her influence by a bold reformation in her intellectual life, by conforming to the new age in her literary tastes, and maintaining in sentiment what she lost in power, Sparta, which still had a profound hold on the respect of Greece, allowed all the modern corruption and decay to invade her under the guise of strict opinion of the Spartans, the complete liberty by will had resulted, curiously enough, the practice becoming the ordinary practice. inherited, and these, being always of the family of Lycurgus, became people of influence. The consequence was that younger sons, as mercenaries, where they knocked down in poverty and idleness at home, which course was more likely to be followed. The returning mercenary brought with him the customs of modern Hellenism, tempt upon everything Spartan save the wealthy nobles, whom he instructed in extravagance. The malcontent at home looked away and its goods as unfairly divided. any revolution which should oust the oligarchy of possessors.¹

Thus between those who dreaded change and those who were ready for any revolution a fixed. Even the external appearance was that of her palmy days. Instead of a walled town, together she was now a walled town, a had so polluted the sacred blood of Heracles as to marry an Asiatic wife, and beget strange children—a capital offence according to the old laws.

In Plutarch's Life of Agis, from which I take these details, we have a curious account of the attempt at a peaceful revolution by the young king, who thought to abolish debts and redistribute lands without having recourse to any more than legal violence. He gives his own fortune to the state, a fortune, besides farms and pasture, amounting in ready money to 600 talents (nearly £150,000), but we are told that the poorest satraps in the East had far larger treasure. His plan was baulked by the people of property, who were naturally backed by the elders and ephors; in fact it was a conflict of the old and rich, who held all the magistracies and privileges, against the young and poor, far greater in numbers but with no practical leaders save the enthusiasts and the dishonest. Agis failed; he could 'not turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, the disobedient to the wisdom of the just;' and he was put to death with his noble mother and her friends, who had been converted by his theories, and now shared his fate. The historians of the day tell us many anecdotes of the splendid disinterestedness of these ladies, and however embellished such stories may be, they show clearly what was the ideal of the age.

Cleombrotus had nothing to say, but sat in the deepest distress and silence. Chelonis, the daughter of Leonidas, had looked upon the injury done her father as done to herself: when Cleombrotus robbed him of the crown, she left him, to console her father in his misfortune. While he was in the sanctuary, she stayed with him, and when he retired she attended him in his flight, sympathising with his sorrow, and full of resentment against Cleombrotus. But when the fortunes of her father changed, she changed too. She joined her Chelonis then pointing to her mourning hair, thus addressed Leonidas. 'It was compassion for Cleombrotus which put me in this dress, and gave me this look of misery. My sorrows are increased with your misfortunes and your banishment. My friends since remained my familiar companions, and have conquered your enemies, and are again kind to you. I still retain these ensigns of affliction, and my royal ornaments while the husband of my daughter gave me, falls a victim to your vengeance. I am a mission, if the tears of his wife and child are not enough for you, he must suffer a severer punishment than you require :—he must see his beloved daughter, and for how can I live and support the sight of her? both my husband and my father have been slain. My supplication—when it appears that, my daughter, I am born to be miserable with you, and a poor man had any plausible reasons for his conduct, obviated them all by forsaking him to marry me. I furnish him with a sufficient apology for his conduct, showing that a crown is so great and desirable, that a son-in-law must be slain, and a daughter married where that is in the question.'

Chelonis, after this supplication, rested her head on her husband's head, and with an eye dim and tearful, looked round on the spectators. Leonidas then looked upon the point, and then commanded his friends to rise and go into exile ; but he desired (

false glory, he must have thought exile, with such a woman, a greater happiness than a kingdom without her.¹

We hear also that all the party of the rich through the Peloponnesus, especially in Achæa and Arcadia, were in dread of the revolution proposed by Agis, as it would directly affect each city, so that the inequality of wealth and consequent prominence of discontented pauperism were not found in Sparta only. Still, with all these faults, Sparta produced not only noble men and women, but was socially above all the Hellenistic world. The kings of Sparta were venerated, while the kings of Egypt and Macedon were flattered with vile adulation, and to be a Spartan noble was even still, perhaps, a more distinguished rank than to be one of the Macedonian peers.

We wish Plutarch, in speaking of the wealth and the luxury of noble Spartan ladies, had told us in what that splendour consisted. Sparta was not now an art centre, and what we have found lately² upon its site is work of archaic refinement far older than the present period. Yet we may infer that, however illiterate these nobles were, their taste cannot have been vulgar or gaudy. Their traditions were too splendid, and the antique simplicity of Lycurgeoan habits must have chastened their life. Those who went abroad too, though often rude, sensual and unprincipled, were never reprehended, so far as I know, for the vices of the upstart. This very conservative type must therefore have had no small influence in repressing the tawdry tendencies of the age. Just as the English nobility, however ignorant many of them then ignorance, their backwardness, full of vulgar ostentation, sudden woe. The Asiatic or the Macedonian Hellenism with all his might, could not learn of the Museum, the tenet of the Garden, the wit of Attica; he might learn the particles, but the style of the language was beyond him. It was not the new Hellenism and pure Hellenedom.

¹ Plutarch's Agis, c. xvii.

² Cf. my Rambles and Studies in Greece, 3d. ed. p. 382. These carved reliefs have been reproduced in the Mittheilungen of the German Institute at Athens (ii. and viii.), and again in Duruy's illustrated Hist. of Greece, i. 298, 320.

Let us now turn to the western cities of Tarentum and Syracuse. Both still in the infancy, the one in Sicily, the other in Magna Græcia, any other Italiot settlements vie with them for rivals, Sybaris, Crotona, Agrigentum, but are totally insignificant. The war of 271 B.C. had implicated Tarentum, which had long been a democracy but was still a populous and wealthy city. The produce and the cookery of Tarentum were known throughout the world, but the city was Hellenic, not a Hellenistic capital.

Very nearly the same may be said of Syracuse. It was not a democracy but still a scrupulous tyranny of Agathocles, and then under the prudent and paternal despotism of Hiero, still maintained a high position even in culture. Agathocles was variously connected with the Hellenistic sovrans, and took his place among them as the Emperor Napoleon III. took his place among the sovrans of Europe. Thus Syracuse ranked with the new capitals as well as with the old ; men of letters went there ; they frequented the court of Hiero and sang his praises ; they studied literature and science there, and perhaps no Hellenic city more thoroughly maintained its place, under the new order of things. The people were moreover aristocrats in the true Hellenic sense, Dorians derived from Corinth in almost mythic times, Dorians still in speech and proud of their dialect.¹

Syracuse took no mean part in shaping the current of Hellenistic literature, and contributed the freshest and most original elements to Alexandrian poetry. The shepherds, the lovers, the townspeople of Theocritus are only settlers in Alexandria ; their true home is in Syracuse and its surrounding pastures, or else in the mimes of Sophron.² But I suppose that the Syracusan type was essentially that of a wealthy burgher or very outspoken freeman. For the many tyrants since the elder Dionysius must have levelled their subjects very much, killing or exiling the nobles and men of mark, and favouring the working classes. This was the tendency of every Greek tyranny. So then the Syracusan was the same sort of Hellenic aristocrat as the Athenian—the citizen of a great and famous city, with splendid monuments, great

¹ Cf. Theocr. Idyll xv.—

Κορίνθιαι εἰμὲς ἀνωθεν, ὥς καὶ ὁ Βελλεροφῶν · Πελοποννασιστὶ λαλεῦμες · Δωρίσθεν δ' ἔξεστι, δοκῶ, τοῖς Δωριέεσσι.

² Above, p. 282.

and them amalgamated with other cities, and with an influx of Hellenistic names, and with an influx of settlers, like the Jews whom Antioch gave with civic rights in the cities of Asia, that their greatness was gone or had few rivals. Perhaps the most eminent town of Eastern Hellenedom was Byzantium. Celts and Thracians, who harried it since its foundation, still held the key of the Bosporus, in its great position. But even Byzantium was in rivalry of new foundations, such as Lampsacus, Troas, Pergamum, Nicomedia, and Heracleia on the Euxine. Nor can we find evidence¹ on the interior or social conditions. Its politics will occupy us presently in Rhodes.

Passing from these ancient and no longer another class, also of ancient foundations, rebuilt or modified as to date their architecture of this epoch. For it was a common thing for the people of several surrounding towns the site of an old town so as to suit modern requirements and the wishes of the new founder. Examples of either proceeding were New Smyrna, New Ilion, New Sicyon, New Thebes and many others. The first two were in the plans of Alexander, but the actual refoundation was due to Lysimachus, and both attained to considerable prosperity, Ilion even to a primacy over the adjoining towns. Thebes was restored by Casander with the approval and help of the Hellenic world, even including Agathocles of Syracuse. But modern Theban life affords us nothing of interest¹ till we reach the far later days of Plutarch.

¹ Athenæus (xi. 490, 491) cites Mæro, a

Sicyon, on the contrary, was one of the most important of these re-foundations, and a very characteristic example of the class. It had been very handsomely refounded on a higher level, that of its old acropolis, by Demetrius Poliorketes, who desired to call it Demetrias, but without success. This change of site was here possible because a higher and yet isolated plateau² succeeds to the shore level (where the old town stood), with ample room for streets and walls, and with the command of a beautiful view up and down the Gulf of Corinth, and across to the mountains of Bœotia and Phocis. The older Sicyon had been a celebrated art centre. Pausanias, in his account of the place, mentions old works of Calamis and of Scopas, as well as of Lysippus and the newer school, and after its restoration it became one of the chief schools for sculpture and painting in the world—a sort of Hellenistic Florence. In an age of art-collecting, when

¹ The sketch of Bœotian life, with its luxury, sloth and feasting, together with complete idleness and neglect of all public business, given by Polybius (xx. 14), is to me perfectly incredible. How could a people that lived in perpetual idleness, and also extravagance, remain rich and keep the means of luxury?

² A very interesting view of this site was drawn by Sir T. Wyse, and may be seen in his Travels in the Peloponnesus.

collecting and sending to Philade he conciliated and maintained the now, indeed, part of a good education matters, as the following extract will

This taste for painting had already Ptolemy, and his conversation gained him that he made him a present of a for the city ; forty of which he sent to Peloponnesus, and he remitted the rest and at the times that he had fixed.
apply so much money to the use of a time when it was common to see gogues, for much smaller sums which kings, oppress, enslave, and betray to they were born. But it was still money to reconcile the poor to the commonwealth, and establish harmony people.

His moderation in the exercise of vested with was truly admirable. For arbitrator of the claims of the exiles, he and joined fifteen of the citizens in whose assistance, after much labour and peace and friendship amongst the people which the whole community conferred on the exiles in particular erected his statue upon it this inscription .

This culture at Sicyon was, however, not the outcome of free institutions, but flourished under a succession of tyrants, who murdered and exiled many rich citizens, and succeeded to power by the murder of their rivals. It was under these circumstances that the young Aratus was exiled, and brought up by family friends at Argos. We are surprised to hear that, far from enduring the traditional hardships of a Greek exile, he lived in luxury and comfort, training for athletics, entertaining his friends, and in fact cloaking his designs on Sicyon by the notoriety of his somewhat dissolute amusements. At all events, life at Argos, as well as at Sicyon, must have been easy for the richer classes, and we cannot but hold that the crimes of the tyrants of both places have been grossly exaggerated, since no wholesale confiscations could have occurred in such society as that in which Aratus moved.

In fact Plutarch, the sworn enemy of tyrants, who gives us such highly-seasoned pictures of them as are found in his Life of Dion, is obliged to admit the high culture of Sicyon, and Strabo (viii. 383) says they were, as a rule, moderate and well-meaning men. This agrees with what we know of the temper of the world, the popularity of monarchy, and the desire of able men to impress a higher character upon the age. Such was probably the tyrant Abantidas of Sicyon, whom the conspirators of the Peripatetic school murdered while he was attending, according to his wont, the philosophical discussions of the market-place.

But of course mere ambition was also a cause of tyranny, especially when backed up by the favour and support of the kings. We feel it was a mere accident that Aratus himself was not a tyrant, instead of the destroyer of tyrants. He preferred political influence to absolute power, but when his

the old Dorian aristocracy of the (Achaia, Corinth, and Argos), with pride, but were not of the new school of philosophy, but athletes, poets, critics, art patrons, soldiers. We again from Plutarch that Aratus, in his policy, showed himself a mean temper, preferring surprises policy and war to open and fair may be sure, was common enough.
But in their daily life, in their music,
plate and their pictures, their furniture,
they took up the spirit of the age
the materials of earlier, as they Hellenic life.

We now come to the most characteristic of cities, the many new foundations of the Hellenistic world, and of which the most were the greatest and the most splendid.
these cities, again, were of various types.
Alexandria, and Candahar in military outposts, founded by common sostom, where men held the plough with one hand and the sword with the other, and read their Homer in the watch-towers while on the look-out for the invading barbarians.¹

Far more curious are the plantations of cities in the midst of old culture, in the neighbourhood of old and inhabited sites, and even as rivals of the foundations of rival kings. In such countries as Syria, Cilicia, Caria, where the Lagidæ and Seleucidæ struggle for pre-eminence, both build towns, and in close proximity. We may be certain that they felt secure of the allegiance of such towns to the power that founded them, but what privileges could they give, and how could they make it men's interest to come together from their settled homes into a new place? For surely the whole of these new cities, which are reckoned by hundreds, were not peopled by roving mercenaries or other adventurers.

Let us take the larger and more prominent case of the new capitals, and ask the same questions. Not only did Seleucus found Antioch and Ptolemy establish Alexandria as capitals, but the former did so in spite of the foundation of a splendid residency a few miles inland—Antigoneia—by Antigonus, who was killed at Ipsus. It may be possible, as Droysen holds, that this Antigoneia survived the foundation of the new capital, but of course the great body of its population must have migrated to Antioch.² It seems to have been a sort of religion in those days for every king or dynast to found his own capital. Pyrrhus did so at Ambracia, Prusias at Nicomedia, Attalus at Pergamum, Lysimachus at Lysimacheia, and so many others. As the officials, produced considerable benefit. They were glad to settle at the centre of affairs, and were there no special privileges or exemptions for the new citizens. The example of Ptolemy brilliantly followed up by Ptolemy stimulated lesser dynasts to imitate him.

¹ Cf. the very interesting oration, xxxvi. (Borystheniticus) of Dion Chrysostom.

² In my opinion the whole of it. We know that the very tutelary deity of Antigoneia, the statue of the personified fortune of that city, was carried away and set up in Antioch (K. O. Müller, Antiqq. Antioch. p. 41, ed. Calvary).

But all this is not enough to explain the increase of city life all over the country and the population which changed from that of villages, into that of towns. Take Palestine and Syria. Not to speak of the fact that there were scores of cities founded by the Greeks (Ptolemais, Joppa, Akko, etc.) or that Bethshan was renamed Scythopolis, among them a Dion and a Daphne, the influx of Macedonians all through Coele-Syria. There must have been at that epoch a general natural tendency towards this kind of life. The kings turned to their own advantage.

We may see the same thing on a smaller scale of the present century. Since the beginning of the well paved and lighted and the houses built since there have been no more agrecable, if not more profitable, than that of solitary farm houses. So there are many districts which, without any interference of the proprietor or the state, have become gradually depopulated and turned into large grass parks, while all the people have settled in the neighbouring towns.¹ This seems to have been the case on a gigantic scale in the epoch we are now studying. The new towns were all built on a large and comfortable model; they were well paved; they had ample arrangements for lighting at night, and for a good water-supply; they had police arrangements, and good thoroughfares secured to them by land and water. These were in themselves privileges enough to tempt all the surrounding peasants, all the people who lived in old-fashioned incommodious villages, to settle in a fresh home. It is likely too that in those days trade outran small husbandry; if it required large farms and capital to make farming pay, the smaller yeomen would of course disappear and turn shopkeepers. In any case trade was so stimulated by the systematising of the world's thoroughfares that it occupied an enormous number of people. Greek influence too was always in the direction of town life, for there was perhaps no second instance now of a place like Elis, where the rich proprietors were such complete country people that they hardly ever came into town, and had their interests looked after by the officials who dwelt there. The sacrosanct character of Elis, and its consequent freedom from raids and invasions, had been the prime condition of this survival.

¹ There is a district, not far from Rugby, in Leicestershire, where several parishes have become empty; in one of them the parson is now not appointed, in the next he has but one family under his charge. A few men with dogs look after the splendid herds of cattle which graze upon this solitude. In the last century all this land was tilled; now the people have drifted into Rugby, and taken to town life and town occupations.

from this new and brilliant centre.

CHAPTER XIV

PERGAMUM AND ITS POSITION IN THE HELLENISTIC WORLD

KING LYSIMACHUS, towards the end of his life, had entrusted the fort of Pergamum with its treasure—9000 talents—to an officer called Philetærus, a man of no family but of ability and vigour. He is said to have fallen into disfavour with Arsinoë when she was Queen of Lysimachus, no doubt in connection with the various towns she received as dower. For one of them, Amastris, was apparently held by Eumenes, the brother or nephew of Philetærus, and if the latter, his successor at Pergamum. However, the murder of Lysimachus's son by the wiles of Arsinoë and Ptolemy Keraunus kept Lysimachus distracted, and most likely, when Seleucus advanced against him, Philetærus, who was an opportunist, and steered his way by fair promises and attention towards the nearest great power,¹ showed himself ready to adopt the Seleucid side. He was unmolested by Seleucus, and when the latter was murdered by Keraunus, purchased the body for a great sum, and burnt it with pomp, sending the ashes to Antiochus, the new Seleucid king. By these means he secured himself with the new ruler of Asia, and seems to have escaped, in spite of his treasure, invasion from the Galatæ, for, dying in 263 at the ripe age of eighty, he actually bequeathed his command to his nephew Eumenes, the dynast of Amastris in Pontus.

¹ πολιτευόμενος δὲ ὑποσχέσεων καὶ τῆς ἄλλης θεραπείας ἀεὶ πρὸς τὸν ἰσχύοντα καὶ ἐγγὺς παρόντα, says Strabo, xiii. 623. There is no connection between Eumenes of Amastris and the famous Eumenes of Cardia, whose life Plutarch has written (above, p. 37 sq.)

It seems that Antiochus Soter, though bound by ties of gratitude to Philetærus, thought it now time to interfere, and essayed to subdue the new dynast of Pergamum by arms. But he was defeated in a battle near Sardis by Eumenes, and died too soon after, in battle with the Galatæ, to make any renewed attempt upon Pergamum. So Eumenes was for the moment secure in his possessions, which embraced a district, we know not how large, round Pergamum. Here he maintained himself for twenty-two years, and in the strange complexities and confusions of the period we cannot find his name connected with any great war or treaty, until he asserted himself against Antiochus Hierax, the son of Theos, near the end of his life.

No doubt our information is at this moment very defective. We know that Antiochus II. had his hands full. He made an expedition by the Hellespont into Thrace, where he brought to his side many towns, in opposition to the policy of Philadelphus, who was aiming at the complete dominion of the Levant by his fleets and armies. But there is not a word of his being helped or opposed on his way by Eumenes. Presently the king is entitled Theos, a god, by the grateful inhabitants of Miletus, whom he rescued from a tyrant. He is then said to have given freedom, that is, of course, communal freedom, to the cities of Ionia. But not a word about Pergamum or the towns under its sway. This silence of our authorities is most curious. Amid all the wars, tumults, treaties, alliances of this disturbed period, Pergamum seems an oasis of rest, a harbour of security, and it may, indeed, be said of this Eumenes, bene qui latuit vixit.¹

It was just the moment when each of the great kingdoms, in addition to their wars with one another, was threatened with dangerous revolts or new formations within its immediate territories. Ptolemy had to contend with the diversion made by Demetrius the Fair in Cyrene (about 255 B.C.) Antiochus Theos was in vain endeavouring to overcome the great revolt of Arsaces, who founded the Parthian kingdom in the upper provinces of the Seleucid empire. Antigonus Gonatas, now an old man, was face to face with the growth of the Achæan league under Aratus, which threatened to destroy his influence in Greece. So Eumenes I. guided his course successfully, like his uncle, between the Scylla of diplomacy and the Charybdis of conquest. His immunity from the Galatæ is, perhaps, the most curious feature of his life, and may have been bought with heavy black mail, for the first great act of his brilliant successor, Attalus I., was to meet these barbarians in battle, and gain over them a great victory.

We hear from Diogenes Laertius, in his Life of Arkesilaos, that Eumenes esteemed that philosopher particularly, and trusted to him for personal recommendations of officers. The relations of the rising culture of Pergamum were very close with Athens, and of the next Attalid we hear similar stories of his intimacy with Lakydes, Arkesilaos's successor in the Academy, for whom he adorned a special garden (Lakydeion) in the Academy at Athens. But later on we find it not the Academy but the Stoa which prevails at Pergamum. I attribute this to the readiness of the Stoics, who were cosmopolitans, to reside there, while the Academicians were essentially Athenian, and declined repeated invitations to visit the Attalids, Lakydes with the mot that portraits were best seen from a distance.

¹ It is reported in Athenæus, on the authority of the chronologist Ctesicles, that he died of drunkenness. This would account for his obscurity in external politics, but not for his safety from invasion or other disturbance.

If Eumenes I. is obscure, Attalus I., his first cousin, and son of the third brother of Philetærus, was exceptionally celebrated. He reigned from 241 to 197 B.C., while all the other courts in the Hellenistic world changed hands, and he maintained all his life not only power but great respect. It was to him that were due most of the noble buildings which adorned his new capital, and he celebrated his first great victory, and his assumption of the title king, by splendid art offerings not only at home but at Athens and elsewhere.

He really had succeeded to the Asiatic portion of the great kingdom of Lysimachus, and when the Galatæ were checked, there was no one to prevent his city becoming the real capital of western Asia Minor.

The Seleucid throne was occupied by a boy, who was in conflict with his brother, and had, moreover, the Parthian revolt to settle, if he could. Antigonus Gonatas was a man of eighty, and when he died in 239 B.C. his successor had to deal with the Achæan and Ætolian leagues in the south, and the inroads of the terrible Illyrians and Dardanians on the northwest. In Egypt, Euergetes, after his brilliant campaign into Asia, which had for the moment crushed the Seleucids, and even emulated the march of Alexander to India, was content to cripple Syria by diplomatic means, and was necessarily a friend of Attalus so long as Pergamum could not rank as a first-rate power. Hence the King of Pergamum had only to defend himself against the Seleucid attempts to recover from him the large territory he had annexed in Asia Minor, reaching indeed up to the Taurus. He easily disposed of Antiochus Hierax, Seleucus II.'s brother, who was endeavouring to establish an independent sovranity in Asia Minor, but was in far greater difficulties when the king himself came against him some years later (222 B.C.) Seleucus was indeed assassinated during the campaign, but the real command lay with his uncle Achæus, the ablest man of his day, who defeated Attalus, took back all Asia Minor, and for a long time besieged him closely in his capital.

But the loyalty of Achæus, which had at first been proof against the diadem, gave way before these successes, and his assumption of the insignia of royalty brought against him the young king Antiochus III. (the Great), and this saved Attalus. So, then, Attalus held his power, and, living with probity and in harmony with his family, he spent a long life in raising his capital into a real rival of Alexandria. He began to collect a library; he gathered scholars and critics about him; the Stoic philosophy found a special home at Pergamum; nor do we know of any Hellenistic city, except perhaps Rhodes, where life was more refined, morals better, or learning more respected. The good example of the royal house, which managed even indirect successions without jealousy or crime, must have acted with wholesome effect on the population.

We now know from the remarkable researches of Brunn and others that to Attalus may be ascribed the high merit of having produced or fostered a new school of sculpture, the so-called Pergamene, of which we have such remarkable remains that we may fairly call it the most original art-development of this century. Attalus presented to Athens, and set up in the Acropolis, four elaborate groups of statues—one mythological (gods and Titans), one heroic (Athenians and Amazons), one historical (Athenians and Persians), and the last historical also, but what was quite new,

a composition celebrating his own victory over the Gauls.¹ Such an ideal treatment of present events was an advance upon the portrait statues of the Macedonian peers slain at the Granicus, which Alexander had set up. For from the extant remains in various museums we know that the actual defeat, the dying anguish, the savage despair of the barbarians—these were the main features of the fourth group. Akin to these, and of the same date and school, are the famous dying Gaul (once called a gladiator), and the group called Pætus and Arria, which represents a Gallic warrior, who has just slain his wife, committing suicide, while he seeks to sustain the relaxing form beside him. These two representations of suicide, for the dying Gaul is evidently such also, picture not only the rough, clumsy, though powerful type of barbarian strength as opposed to Hellenic grace, but also that tendency to despair and to self-destruction which to the Greeks was so strange.² The great national enemy must be represented as terrible, as inhuman perhaps, so as to enhance the glory of the Attalid victory, and yet it would not be art if the spectator were not deeply affected by the intensity of the despair, and the profound truth in the representation of the supreme agony of death. In older Greek art barbarians, if produced, are only indicated externally, by their dress and defeat. Now it is the naked Gaul whose essentially non-Hellenic features are brought before us; his defeat is not material but spiritual ; though not slain he abandons life, and executes upon himself the work of the victor. We shall return to the art of Pergamum in the next generation, and show its persistence under the Attalids ; but this we may here say, that if Hellenism showed power in architecture (by perfecting the Corinthian order and the arch), in poetry, as we have seen, and in painting, nowhere was it greater and more original than here.

¹ Art-critics have identified seventeen types of famous statues as due to the votive offerings of Attalus.

² This is the point insisted upon by Overbeck, Griech. Plastik. ii. 225. But if the dignity of suicide was foreign to the older and purer Greeks, what shall we say of the results of Stoic teaching, brought in from semi-Greek provinces like Lycia, where it was certainly not uncommon in older times, and taught, as we know, sedulously in Pergamum? Possibly this philosophy may have aided in making suicide an honourable act, and so thoroughly fit for plastic art.

As we know that Attalus's new capital gave this great stimulus to art, and in the next century, through rivalry with Alexandria, to criticism also, we should expect to find some new blossom of literature. It is strange that nothing of the kind can be traced directly to Pergamum, beyond the certain fact that Stoic philosophers lived and taught there, and that some flatterers of Attalus wrote memoirs of his youth and acts. But I think there is indirect evidence enough to associate with the Asia Minor of this generation, and therefore of course with the Attalids, the rise of that new school of eloquence called by the critics Asianic,¹ as opposed to Attic. The founder or leader of this school, Hegesias, hailed from Magnesia, by Mount Sipylus, and its diffusion is always spoken of as among the cities of Asia Minor, which, as we know, were either nominally free or under the sway of Attalus. This latter condition was particularly the case with inland towns, which could not join the league, or at all events secure the protection, of the Rhodians. Nor do we ever hear of the sway of the Attalids as being severe enough to kill eloquence, either forensic or judicial, within the domain of communal affairs. This, however, is certain, that while the literary hot-bed of Alexandria produced quantities of poetry it produced no oratory, and hardly any history, in spite of the example set by the first king, in his Memoirs of Alexander. While, therefore, poetry and science flourished at Alexandria, history and oratory made themselves a new home in Asia Minor. We do not hear that Hegesias taught or exhibited at Pergamum, but his fashion must have been the fashion of that capital, and agrees very well with what we know of the rest of Pergamene art.

¹ I suggested this word long ago as suitable to distinguish the products of Asia Minor from those of Inner Asia, which are Asiatic.

The sculpture was, however, decidedly better than the eloquence. Solid and motionless marble is easier to compare with rival works, and its variations from a great type are readily seen. In the far more subtle and varying art of literary style it is very easy to wander from great models, to fail even in direct imitation, to seek originality, and suffer by the very success itself. The fashion of the day was to strike out something new and sparkling, to hit points, make sudden effects, and for the rest to aim at studious simplicity. Nothing seemed to Hegesias and his school greater waste of labour than the style of Demosthenes, who composed every sentence of his arguments in elaborate and carefully constructed periods, and almost systematically avoided flashes of wit or digressions of ornament. And it might be conceded that if you do not thoroughly study Demosthenes's circumstances, and become one of his actual audience at Athens in Philip's day, his speeches are dull reading. It requires a special training in the laws of Greek rhetoric to find out his artfully disguised artifices, some of which have not been recovered till the present day.¹

The new Asianic rhetors, therefore, in opposition to the decaying Attic school, which still strove to imitate the last ripe fruit of Attic liberty, chose Lysias for their model, though they were just as far from the grace of that archaic figure with its stereotyped smile, as they were from the masterful ease of Hypereides. It was Spohr professing to turn back from Beethoven's complexity to Mozart, and reproducing the old master's simplicity sugared and seasoned with the sweets of nineteenth century harmonies. In the very same way Hegesias, though he wrote short and plain sentences, could not dispense with those epigrammatic or antithetic smartnesses which were only tolerable when a very strict taste controlled them; and this taste seems lost among the Asianic rhetors and their public. Dionysius, a very severe critic of the Augustan time, when men had come round again to appreciate the real greatness of Greek literature, and to reverence the golden age of eloquence, will not allow Hegesias the smallest credit. He says that not a single page of his works is without the most shocking faults of style, and that such composition cannot arise from ignorance, which must sometimes chance to be right, but from a deliberate preference for the wrong. It is quite possible that this particular judgment is too severe, but the critic justly notes the remarkable decadence in literary taste which marked the diffusion of Greek letters through all manner of semi-Greek and mixo-barbarous people.

¹ By the genius of Blass. Cf. the account of these matters in my Hist. of Gk. Lit., ii. pp. 340 sq.

The fragments of Hegesias show the very same contrast to those of Demosthenes that the writings of Macaulay show to those of Gibbon. Instead of the long periods, the carefully rounded and rythmical clauses, we have short terse statements in serried series, and without any grammatical links.¹ He was guilty, moreover, of 'effeminate measures,' such as trochees and tribrachs, and other such violations of the mysteries of Greek prose ; what was far worse, he was guilty of false pathos, of exaggerated sentiment, of misplaced appeals to the sympathy of his audience.

¹ E.g. from Strabo, p. 396—ὁρῶ τὴν ἀκρόπολιν καὶ τὸ τῆς περιττῆς τριαίνης ἐκεῖθε σημεῖον · ὁρῶ τὴν Ἑλευσῖνα, καὶ τῶν ἱερῶν γέγονα μίστης · ἐκείνο Λεωκόριον · τοῦτο Θησεῖον · οὐ δύναμαι δηλῶσαι καθ' ἕνα καστον.

All these things are very important in showing us the shady side of Hellenism as an epoch of culture. It was, of course then, as always, the case, that a very wide diffusion of letters brought with it, as natural consequences, shallowness of knowledge and superficiality of taste. It was no doubt in the face of this fact that the school of Alexandria was so laboriously learned in Hellenic lore, and so conscientious in the pursuit of science. We ought to judge it not by contrast to Attic purity and grace, but in comparison with the Asianic fashions, the flashy display of Hegesias and his following.¹

The peculiar morality and refinement of the court and city of Attalus will best appear if we compare it with what had happened to the rulers of Egypt and Syria who were his contemporaries. The young king Ptolemy III. (Euergetes) had been married in his father's last year to Berenice, princess of Cyrene, a young lady of great spirit, but of still greater adventures. Demetrius the Fair had been sent from Macedonia to occupy her kingdom with her hand, but while she was waiting to be of marriageable age, he had beguiled the time by intriguing with her mother, and Berenice was obliged to have him put to death, perhaps in her mother's chamber, and almost under her own eyes. After this experience she married the young king of Egypt—doubtless a second political alliance, but one which seems to have turned out well. Yet no sooner had she entered upon her new happiness than her bridegroom was called away to avenge the horrid murder of his sister,¹ who had been sent, a new wife, to the aging Antiochus Theos, king of Syria, on the condition of his repudiating his former wife Laodice (sister of Achæus), as well as her children, now growing boys. The king had made an expedition to Asia Minor, where (at Sardis) he again fell under the influence of the divorced Laodice, who forthwith poisoned him, and had her son proclaimed king, with the natural consequence that her party in Antioch rose against the new Egyptian queen, and murdered her and her infant child.

¹ Wilamowitz says (Antig. von Karystos, p. 155) that from Pergamum and its intimate ally Cyzicus came at this time the impulse to revive the Ionic dialect in literature. If this be so, it was a remarkable attempt to assert a peculiar place in Hellenistic literature, and to make Pergamum a seat of distinct culture. But to revive the old Ionic dialect, which had long disappeared from literature, and was even passing away from the people's tongue, was the same sort of attempt that we now see in Ireland to galvanise the old Irish language into life.

Here is the sort of anecdote we find connected with these tragedies. When Laodice was clearing away the partisans of Egypt along with her faithless husband, one of her retinue, Danae, the daughter of that well-known courtesan Leontium, who had been a hearer of Epicurus, saved the life of her lover, Sophron, the commandant of Ephesus, by warning him of his danger. She was accordingly cast from a cliff by Laodice, to whom she refused any explanation, going to her death with the remark 'that it was no wonder many people were sceptical about the gods, seeing that she, who had been faithful to her lover, was now dying for it, while Laodice, who had been guilty of every kind of treachery, had obtained all her desires.' On the other hand, we have queen Berenice cutting off her hair, and offering it in a temple in fulfilment of a vow for the safety of her husband.¹

¹ Such was the luxury of the Egyptian court, that her father, Philadelphus, had made arrangements to send the water of the Nile for her use to Antioch; she was, perhaps, his favourite child, sacrificed to policy, and condemned to a dreadful fate. But to send fresh water to Antioch was, indeed, like our 'coals to Newcastle,' for no city was more splendidly provided, not to speak of the high pressure produced by the mountain streams. The tanks of Alexandria must have seemed to the Syrians contemptible, yet the water of the Nile was always thought particularly wholesome.

The campaign of Ptolemy III. into Asia exceeded anything done since Alexander's time. He conquered as much as he chose. He marched as far as India. He came back round Arabia, and explored the far parts of the Red Sea. So it appears from an inscription (Greek) which he set up at Adule, far down the Red Sea, on a marble throne, where it was read in the fifth century by the monk Cosmas Indicopleustes, and fortunately copied by him so far as it survived. But the king was no Pyrrhus or Demetrius. He probably recognised in their new kingdoms the Bactrian and Parthian dynasts. He appointed Xanthippus, the conqueror of Regulus at Carthage, to the satrapy of the Mesopotamian provinces. He set up Antiochus Hierax, younger brother of the young king Seleucus II., to dispute with him Asia Minor. He held Seleucia on the Orontes to give him command of Syria, and then, having apparently dismembered the Seleucid empire, he was content.

His danger lay not there, it lay in the combination of second-rate powers, such as Pergamum and Rhodes, to prevent the disturbance of the balance of power in the Levant. But enough of politics. What I want rather to insist upon here, in contrast to the truly Hellenic development of Pergamum, is the strong Egyptian reaction against Hellenism which appears to have begun under Euergetes, and to have been favoured by him.

In the first place, his great care, in his eastern campaign, was to seek out and bring back all the Egyptian gods and sacred things carried away by the Persians as trophies to Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis. Upon his return he built in memory of his victories not a Greek temple at Alexandria, but an Egyptian temple at Esne in Upper Egypt, that small temple on which Champollion and Rosellini still read his inscriptions, but which has since been destroyed.

¹ See above, on the Coma Berenices of Catullus.

At Karnak he built a great Pylon known by his name, which shows, by the way, how he was gradually breaking away from Greek to Egyptian fashions, for here in the doorway he is represented in Greek costume, a very rare thing in subsequent Ptolemaic monuments. This Pylon is an offering from Euergetes and Berenike to their parents, Philadelphus and Arsinoe. A short way to the north-east are the ruins of another temple built by Euergetes, near the village of Nega-el-Fokanu. He added to the great temple of Philæ, said to have been begun by Philadelphus. These remains, and no doubt there are more, show the king to have been an assiduous builder of Egyptian temples.¹

Then we know from the famous inscription found at Tanis, drawn up in the ninth year of his reign, that the Egyptian priests assembled in solemn conclave yearly to transact business with him, and that they received from him many privileges. Let us consider this piece of evidence more particularly.

The inscription found by Lepsius at San in 1865 is dated 7th March 238 B.C. (according to the corrections to be made for the aberration of the Egyptian from solar months), and, therefore, comes after the king's great Asiatic campaigns. It is chiefly from the just-mentioned inscription of Adule that we know the extent of these campaigns. The present document is on a stone 7 feet by $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet, and in the edition of Lepsius (Berlin, 1866) there is no mention of the demotic version, which was at first not noticed, being engraved not on the face, but round the edge of the stone. There are thirty-seven lines of hieroglyphs to seventy-six of Greek, showing how compendious a form of writing and language the old Egyptians possessed. The text is practically complete, not mutilated like the Rosetta stone, so that the whole document is before us.

¹ The reader will most easily find these buildings described in Murray's Egypt, pp. 495, 503, 524.

The priests were assembled at Alexandria for the anniversary feast of the king's coronation in February, when a young princess, called, like the queen, Berenike, suddenly died about the 20th February. This the priests made the occasion for a great public lamentation, and remained from the 5th of Tybi (23d February) to the 17th (6th March). Before their departure to their several sacerdotal duties, the decree was drawn up. I give only an abstract of the main portions of it, as the reader has already had a specimen of the details of such a text above (p. 176). After the date and titles of the king and queen, and an account of the assembly of all the priests at Canopus, they declare :—

‘WHEREAS the king and queen have shown much benevolence to the temples of the country, and are ever increasing the honours of the gods at great cost and with great care, and the king has brought back in triumph the images of the gods robbed by the Persians, and restored them to their several temples, and whereas by his successful wars he has kept the land in peace, and by his laws and ordinances in prosperity; and whereas when the river Nile one year failed to rise sufficiently, and all were in dread of a famine, such as had occurred on previous occasions, the king, by his remission of taxes and importation of corn from foreign lands, saved the people from distress, so doing permanent benefit, and leaving a record of his goodness—

‘IT IS DECREED: That the worship of the previous kings and queens shall be increased by priesthoods, offerings, and worship to the gods Euergetæ (Benefactor Gods), and that a fifth clan shall be added to the existing four clans (φύλαι) of priests in each temple, to be called the clan of the Benefactor Gods, with all the rights, privileges, etc., of the existing clans, with three holy days every month, and a yearly feast in honour of these gods. This great yearly feast for the whole land is to be celebrated on the day when the star of Isis rises, which is regarded in the holy writings as New Year’s Day, but in this ninth year (of Euergetes’s reign) is celebrated on the 1st of Payni, when the harvest and the rising of the Nile take place; the feast of the Euergetæ is to be further celebrated at exact intervals of four solar days, by adding one day to every four years, so that it may coincide with the rising of the star, and show that what was deficient formerly in the arrangement of the feasts, in that summer feasts gradually moved into the winter, and vice versâ, has been successfully emended and completed by the Benefactor Gods.

‘AND WHEREAS the daughter sprung from King Ptolemy and Queen Berenike, the Benefactor Gods, and also called Berenike, passed suddenly as a maiden into eternity, while the priests were present on their yearly visit, who made great lamentation, and persuaded the king and queen to set up the (new) goddess by the side of Osiris in the temple of Canopus, with many other honours and sacrifices then specified—IT IS DECREED: That she shall have honours in all the temples of Egypt, and a special yearly feast to last four days, and that a special image of her in gold adorned with precious stones is to be set up in the temples, and carried forth by the priests in their solemn processions, to be seen, honoured, and adored by all the people, under the title Berenike, Princess of Maidens. Further, that the diadem upon her head shall differ from that of her mother's images, and shall consist of two ears (of corn), and between them the serpent-diadem, but behind this a papyrus-shaped sceptre proper, such as goddesses hold in their hands, and about which the tail of the serpent diadem shall be wound, in order that from the arrangement of the diadem the title of Berenike shall be recognised according to the ideographs of the sacred writing ; and, among further honours, that the maiden daughters of priests may worship her with special offerings hereafter described, and at the yearly feasts both men and women singers are to sing her praises, which the sacred scribes shall deliver in writing to the master of the singing, and of which copies shall be made in the sacred books, and that the daughters of the priests shall receive certain allowances, marked as the bread of Berenike, from the temple revenues. This decree to be set up in hieroglyphic, Egyptian (demotic), and Greek writing in all temples of the first, second, and third ranks.'

From all this we might fairly expect that Hellenistic art and literature would not flourish under this king, as it had done under Philadelphus. There were indeed great people at the museum, especially Eratosthenes and Apollonius, now elderly men, who survived from the old king's time, but the supply begins to diminish, and we have no new names to compare with Callimachus, Apollonius, and Theocritus. We do not hear of a single Greek sculptor at Alexandria, though so many hundreds of Egyptian artists must have been in the royal employment. The paintings the king prized were those of earlier artists sent him from Greece by Aratus, but in this art too we know of no Alexandrian school.

If I mistake not, the king had felt that his father went too far in the Hellenic direction, and he determined to favour a national reaction.

The distracted condition of the Seleucid empire, the struggles of Seleucus Callinicus and his brother Antiochus Hierax, which lasted for years, then the disturbances on the death of Seleucus—all these events prevented Antioch from taking its place as the leader of Asiatic Hellenism. Indeed we hear that the building of the city was not completed according to its original plan till the reign of Antiochus IV. (Epiphanes). So then with the Egyptian king favouring home culture, and indeed in the latter years of his life apparently wanting in vigour, whether from constitutional ill health or the excesses of his youth; with the old Macedonian king dead, and succeeded by a Demetrius who is only known through his wars, the centre of gravity as regards culture and letters came back from the greater capitals to Pergamum, as we have seen, to Rhodes, which we shall presently consider, and to Greece itself, where Aratus was making the Achaean League an important power, and, above all, was supporting the cause of the rich aristocrats and the people of taste against the hungry democracy of poor people who were clamouring for better land laws and for social reforms.

I do not know why we never hear of this land question in Asia Minor, or in the other Hellenistic regions. In Greece it is the main feature of this epoch. We saw how it affected Sparta with its royal demagogue. In Achaia the whole life of Aratus was devoted to keeping it quiet. It had distracted Athens not many years before. But in Asia, owing, I conjecture, to some radical difference in tenure, I am not aware that this problem existed. The great number of new foundations, like Alexandria Troas and Pergamum, or of refoundations, like the new Smyrna, made it easy there at least to regulate the land question according to present requirements; nor do we hear much of old Asiatic cities, whence, perhaps, the discontented were drafted off to settle in the new. In Greece, on the other hand, we hear of hardly any new towns; land seems to have passed gradually into fewer hands, and to have been held on old titles, hence any land reform was sure to meet with violent opposition. But these are only surmises. I must be content to note the fact, and wait for a clearer explanation.

I will conclude this chapter with the natural reflections suggested by that gigantic turning of country-people into towns-people, which might perhaps be almost called a definition of Hellenism. The dominant nation, the Macedonians, did not condescend to Hellenise themselves in this sense. There was no foundation of great towns, or gathering in of rustic peasants throughout Macedonia, and so this country, like Italy, possessed a yeomanry that made excellent soldiers, but not men of letters or artists. Hence it was that the moment Macedonia ceased to be a dominant, and therefore military, nation, it ceased to exist in the world's history. But there were few parts of the world—perhaps only Sogdiana with its Aryan barons and Elis with its country gentry—which remained in this condition. Everywhere else the pleasures or privileges of town life, of that long-established Hellenic form of culture, were either forced upon the nations or offered them as a bribe.

And so the Hellenistic world,—northern Greece, the Propontis, Asia Minor, Syria, Mesopotamia, all adopted the virtues and vices of towns-people and abandoned those of country folk. Theocritus has to go to the uplands of Sicily and southern Italy to find his pictures of pastoral and country life; for the harvest scene at Cos is really one of mock shepherds enjoying the vintage at their suburban villa. People became, I suppose, less hardy and fonder of luxury, less disposed to fight as soldiers, and more ready to settle disputes by diplomacy, or if not, by the help of mercenaries. No doubt the contempt of the country bumpkin and the pride of urbanity increased, and so also the higher esteem of trade as compared with farming.

These things may be inferred from the nature of the case, though unfortunately we have hardly any contemporary documents to illustrate them. In Theocritus's dialogue of the fishermen—often denied to him because it differs widely from his other works, as if that were not to be expected from a man trying all sorts of experiments in poetry—the very language of the lower classes living apart from the town is represented as differing widely from polite Greek. In the book of Ecclesiasticus, which was not composed without indirect influences of Hellenism, we hear as acknowledged experience—‘How can he have wisdom whose talk is of bullocks?’

We must, however, come down much later to find a deliberate sketch of the contrasts of town and country life. In the remarkable prose idyll of Dion Chrysostom,¹ which only the stolidity of a full-blown pedant could mistake for a narrative of real facts, Dion represents himself as shipwrecked on the wild outer coast of Eubœa, and hospitably entertained by two families of utter country people, living by hunting and husbandry, and spending their pure and guileless lives far from the madding crowd. In the course of his romantic sojourn with these people one of them narrates to him the only visit he ever paid to the city, and the strange manners of the people—noisy, litigious, anxious to plunder every quiet country man, and full of contemptuous amusement at the rude innocence of the boor.

¹ No. VII. of his Discourses, known as Venaticus.

This fancy picture is the climax in which the city tendencies of Hellenism resulted. No doubt the shepherds of Theocritus, with their strong passions and outspoken animality, are more real than the charming hinds of Dion, with their unselfishness, their generosity, their moral purity. But still there is a deep-seated feeling, which has some justification, that life in the midst of woods and mountains, spent in delving, planting, reaping, hunting, preserves certain qualities which are lost or soiled by the constant wear of city life. As we now know that the crowding of human beings must generate animal poisons, so it also produces moral diseases. This was the weak point as well as the strength of Hellenism, the reason why Parthia held her own against it, why Rome so easily conquered it, and, when it had leavened the Roman Empire, this was the feature which gave to the empire that want of cohesion that made it fall before the barbarians, in whom Tacitus discerned the opposite type, the nomad and pastoral chieftain contrasted with the urban and sedentary citizen.

This great fact in the civilisation of the world was created on a large scale in the century before us by the extending of the old Greek city, with its assembly of citizens voting, not through representatives, on their own affairs, to large countries, where every other kind of society was induced to accommodate itself to this. Here is the true importance of all these capitals, trading marts, military colonies, which collected and redistributed the population of the world. Where cities were not very thickly sown great tracts of land must have gone into pasture, perhaps back into forest, like those tracts in the Southern States of North America when slave labour was abolished. Hence many centres of life did not support themselves, but trusted to the activity of merchants in conveying corn from those natural granaries which have for thousands of years produced a great surplus to feed the world. The stopping of the passage of the Bosphorus meant famine prices, and was therefore a cosmopolitan calamity. But I will not anticipate the events of the next generation.

CHAPTER XV

THE MERCANTILE ASPECTS OF HELLENISM—LEAGUES AND FEDERATIONS—ARBITRATION—PUBLIC CREDIT

As we used Pergamum for our observing centre in the last chapter, so we may now transfer ourselves to the not very distant Rhodes, which occupied, as regards the great powers, a position not unlike the domain of Attalus, but with many interesting differences.¹ I have given already above (p. 94) a brief account of the earlier history of the island up to the death of Alexander, and have described the great siege by Demetrius I.

This successful resistance to Demetrius at once secured the position of Rhodes, which was maintained by a careful neutrality, by clearing the sea of pirates, by establishing an uniform marine and commercial law, and by the enlightened habit of offering mediation in cases of war. Nothing is more regrettable to students of the inner life of Hellenism than the scantiness of our information about Rhodes during the eighty years following this great crisis. It was, of course, the essence of Rhodian policy to keep out of wars, which alas ! form the staple of our histories.

¹ The most recent work on Rhodes, which I have used all through this chapter, is Mr. Cecil Torr's Rhodes in Ancient Times. The author has gathered a vast body of facts, especially from the inscriptions, but the book requires a better literary plan and a much fuller index, by which the reader might find his way, and also a public library close at hand, to supply the various texts which he has used without quoting them except by references

It is only from stray notices and on political grounds that Droysen has inferred a war of Rhodes against its closest ally, Egypt, and that in the days of Euergetes's supremacy, when, after his magnificent progress through Asia, he seemed to have destroyed the balance of power and ruined the Seleucid kingdom. Then it was that the Rhodians seem to have taken the part of the Seleucids, either of Seleucus or Antiochus Hierax his brother, and to have won a sea battle against Chremonides, the Athenian exile who was now Ptolemy's admiral. The result, however, of this action was the acquisition or large increase of a province on the coast, called by the Rhodians the Peræa, on other side of the water, reaching from Kaunos to the Ceramic Gulf, and bringing them in a large tribute. We may compare it to the possessions of Holland in the Malay Archipelago, which defray the expenses of the home exchequer, and thus help to keep that small country in great material prosperity.

The annals of commerce no ancient historian ever dreamt of recording. So then we are reduced to gather stray notices of Rhodian enterprise and art, and to use the pictures of Rhodian life to be found in far later days. The political prominence of the island begins with the advent of the three boys to the three great kingdoms about the year 221 B.C.

We know that during the previous eighty years the Rhodians effected a sort of league or combination among the leading cities on the Asiatic seaboard as far as the Bosphorus. But there seem to be reasons to show that Byzantium and Heracleia on the Euxine were not strictly in this federation. Apart from the great trade-produce of the coasts of the Black Sea in leather, wheat, dried fish, cattle, slaves, etc., which these cities would gladly have kept for themselves, there was the northern caravan route from the far East, which reached the sea about the present Batoum, or Trebizond, and which was the competing route with those through Syria, and by the Red Sea to Egypt. Hence the constant struggles of Egypt to maintain a footing in Thrace and the northern Ægean, the struggles of Syria to regain northern Asia Minor, and the great wealth and importance not only of the free Greek towns established there, but of the kingdoms of Pontus and Bithynia, with their new capitals and Hellenistic culture. These northern powers had, moreover, their special struggle with the Galatæ, in which the Rhodians took no part, unless it be by furnishing Antiochus Soter with a general who defeated the barbarians in the 'elephant' victory.¹

On the contrary, the history of the great siege by Demetrius, after which Philadelphus was worshipped by them as a god, shows their close relations to Egypt. We know also that Rhodian captains explored for him the secrets of the western Mediterranean; Rhodes even had a law directing a fleet to go to sea every season, and there is evidence that naval commanders were conceded large powers in acting for the state. Rhodes undertook to clear the sea of pirates, as the Athenians had done, but in the siege of Demetrius we still hear of the 'arch-pirate' as a sort of recognised authority. It is more likely that the Rhodians compelled these corsairs, who always abounded about the southern coast of Asia Minor and in Crete, to come to terms with them, so as not to molest any ship trading under their flag. This was probably the inducement they held out to the Greek cities to join their league; for they certainly had the power of ruining, without going to war, any Levantine seaport which refused their alliance.¹

¹ Cf. above, p. 157.

It appears that soon after 400 B.C. Cos, Cnidos, Halicarnassus, Iasos, Samos, Chios, Ephesus, all coined after the new standard adopted by Rhodes, and this extended even to Ænos, Cyzicus, and Byzantium, so that the elements of a league were already there. The value of Rhodian trade to the world was very clearly recognised by the first Antigonos, if it be true that when he sent Demetrius against them he ordered that the Rhodian merchants in Syria, Phoenicia, Cilicia, and Pamphylia should be unmolested. This was a position never attained by the merchants of Athens, both because the solidarity of the civilised world had not yet been appreciated, and because Athens was an ambitious empire, while Rhodes as yet only aspired to be the universal commercial go-between of all nations. For this purpose it avoided all solemn treaties, though friendly to all, and always ready to offer its services in the way of mediation. I do not think the statement of Polybius, commonly understood as implying formal relations with Rome as early as 304 B.C., is properly to be so interpreted.²

Rhodes was now regarded as the centre of maritime trade. Foreign merchants came to settle there, and young men were sent there, as they now are to Hamburg or Bremen, to learn business. Men had learned the value of commercial credit, and the keeping up of commercial obligations even in the case of war, or when a son succeeded to his father's debts.

¹ On the interesting parallel of Venice and the Adriatic, cf. a passage quoted in Appendix D from Mr. Jackson's Dalmatia, iii. 257.

² Pol. xxx. 5, § 6.—οὕτως γὰρ ἦν πραγματικὸν τὸ πολίτευμα τῶν Ῥοδίων, ὥς σχέδον ἔτη μ' πρὸς τοῖς ῥ' κεκοινωνηκῶς ὁ δῆμος Ῥωμαίοις τῶν ἐπιφανεστάτων καὶ καλλίστων ἔργων οὐκ ἐπεποίητο πρὸς αὐτοὺς συμμαχία. This seems to me to mean simply that though Rhodes had since 304 attained, like Rome, the position of a first-class power, and so had come into various contact with Roman traders, no formal alliance had ever been made.

If we are in complete ignorance of the details of Rhodian commerce, we have a good deal of indirect information about their art. We are told that the metal of Demetrius's siege-engines was employed or sold to make a great statue of Helios, known as the Colossus of Rhodes, and counted among the wonders of the world. The artificer was Chares of Lindus (a pupil of Lysippus), who developed, or perhaps exaggerated, the tendency to produce effect by huge proportions, which we first find at this epoch. I spoke above (p. 112) of the wild proposal to turn Mount Athos into a portrait-statue of Alexander. The Colossus was only 105 feet high, and did not stand across the harbour or act as a lighthouse, but was placed somewhere on the shore, near the harbour. We are told that there were many other colossal statues at Rhodes, which would have been very notable, had they not been surpassed by this work. Unfortunately it was overthrown, some sixty years after its erection, by the earthquake which brings Rhodes into European notice about 227 B.C.; and so the twelve years' labour of Chares and the 300 talents spent upon it turned out a boastful but brief investment. For in consequence of an oracle,¹ which no doubt considered the loss of life and property caused by its fall, it was left lying on the shore, where Pliny saw it 250 years later, and comments upon its appearance. 'Even lying on the ground it is astonishing. Few men are able to make their hands meet round its thumb, each finger is larger than most statues, great caverns yawn into the interior of the limbs, and within you see gigantic rocks, by whose weight the artist had steadied his statue.' It was cast in blocks, which were set up one over the other, and which therefore show how perfectly he must have understood the proportions of the human figure, according to the fixed and scientific canon established by Lysippus. It is, of course, ludicrous to repeat that such an artist made the mistake of asking double the price when the state asked him to double the size of his proposed figure, and so became bankrupt and committed suicide. Yet this is the kind of story we find in our authorities.¹

¹ We probably have its words in the proverb μὴ κινεῖν εὖ κείμενον κακόν.

This, then, and the other colossi at Rhodes, show a desire in the rich merchants to outdo other cities in the magnificence of their public monuments. Unfortunately we have none of them remaining. A large number of artists' signatures on bases have been recovered, from which we learn that many of these bronze statues were portraits, as we might expect, from the school of Lysippus; while the constant mention of adoption² suggests some custom which either compelled or induced strange artists settling at Rhodes to become Rhodian citizens.

In contrast to the novelty and marvel of size which Chares attained in his statue of the Sun, we have extant two works of great fame, which show brilliant success in another direction, that of exceeding all previous sculptors in the complication and variety of an elaborate group. There are now at Rome two famous groups, the Laocoon and the so-called Toro Farnese, of which the former, in the opinion of Pliny, who describes it, and in the opinion of the earlier modern art-critics, stands alone in its perfection. The general public has also gained an interest in it, because it represents a scene described in the most splendid and widely read of Latin poems, the Æneid of Vergil. Though the three sculptors who designed and executed the work jointly or in committee, as Pliny says, probably did not conceive the catastrophe exactly as Vergil did, the agony in the poem and in the marble is the same, and it is this moment which the Rhodian artists ventured to represent, thus abandoning the monumental and ethical traditions of sculpture, and pursuing a new scope, the representation of the extremest emotions at their climax. The analogy to the Pergamene sculpture noticed above is obvious, but here we have a mastery of design and of detail which far exceeds even the great reliefs on the high altar. The Laocoon is intended to be nothing more than a relief brought forward from a niche. It is not intended for any but a front view, nor does it even, as Goethe felt, require a long inspection. There are indeed three distinct stages of human suffering portrayed. The younger boy is just dying of the poison, and has passed the full bitterness of pain; the elder boy is as yet untouched, except by the aspect of his father, and the coil of the snake. Laocoon himself is in the very climax of his agony, already helpless to act, but unimpaired in feeling, and this figure it is which will always rivet the attention of the spectator.

¹ Sext. Empir. Adv. Math. vii. 107, quoted in Overbeck's Schriftquellen, No. 1545. Philo of Byzantium, ranking it as the fourth of the seven wonders of the world, gives a full description, cf. S.Q. 1547.

² In the form 'Αθανόδωρος 'Αγησάνδρου καθ' ὑπόθεσιν δὲ Διονυσίου.

I will not enter into the long controversies about this celebrated work, as to its real age, its originality, its history, which now amount to a vast literature. Adopting the view that what we possess is the original work of Rhodian artists of the period now before us, expressing a legend treated in tragedy by Sophocles, and afterwards freely adapted by Vergil, I think it an important evidence of the vigour and originality of art at Rhodes to find the sculptors exceeding all that had gone before, and in the only way possible—by intensity of expression, elaborateness of finish, and complexity of design. Whether this be indeed an advance may be doubted. Recent critics are perhaps too adverse to the Laocoon, as the older had been too favourable. To me it always seems that the execution fails in making the two boys little men—a defect which I do not see noticed by the art critics. But no one will ever deny that for pathos the work has hardly a rival.¹

The Toro Farnese represents Zethus and Amphion tying Dirke to the horns of a wild bull, while their mother Antiope, whom Dirke had ordered them to punish in this way, and whom they had just recognised as their mother, is standing by. The prolonged cruelties of Dirke to her sister-in-law Antiope, whom she had made her slave, justify, in Greek sentiment, this shocking vengeance. But the sculptors had only before them the moment—the struggle of the strong young men with the bull, the despair and agony of Dirke—and the whole composition is so designed as to require inspection from every side—in this superior to the Laocoon, while perhaps inferior to it in the over-importance and weight of the upper part.² Here, too, the influence of painting on the sculpture of the day is manifest, especially in the carefully worked accessories. The artists' names, Apollonius and Tauriskos of Tralles, are given by Pliny; but that they executed it at Rhodes, from whence it came to Rome to the palace of Asinius Pollio, is also certain.

What must have been the aspect of Rhodes when it was full of these noble works? We know that for painting it was not less celebrated. I have already told the story of Protogenes and his famous Ialysos (p. 108), a painter who long worked in poverty, and must therefore have been obscured by other more popular artists. But when he attained his fame he filled the Dionysion at Rhodes with his paintings, not frescoes, but on panels (πίναξι) and in frames, and so removable. Here was also exhibited his Resting Satyr, with the partridge beside him. The reader who wishes to appreciate the very modern jealousy and conceit of Hellenistic artists, even at Rhodes, will do well to study the passages collected by Overbeck, with anecdotes of this painter and of Apelles.

¹ Cf. the elaborate discussion of the whole matter in Overbeck, Gesch. des Griech. Plastik. ii. 262-302.

² Overbeck, op. cit. 310.

The full description in Lucian of the marriage of Alexander and Roxane by Aetion, which the painter exhibited at Olympia, gives us a further notion of the kind of work which was admired, and a fresh example how completely the Anacreontic cupids, with their sportive attributes, had taken possession of all kinds of art. 'What marvel was there in his picture,' asked some one, 'that the Elean umpire (at the Olympian games) should marry his daughter to an artist, who was a stranger? The picture is now in Italy, and I have seen it, so that I can tell you. There is a very fair chamber, and in it the nuptial couch, and Roxane, a maiden of great beauty, is sitting with eyes fixed on the ground in modesty before Alexander, who is standing. But there are laughing cupids, one of whom is drawing the veil from the bride's head and showing her to the bridegroom; while another, like a servant, is untying his sandals; and a third, taking hold of his tunic, is drawing him as hard as he can towards Roxane. The king himself is handing a garland to the maiden, and his bridesman, Hephæstion, is by with a lighted torch, leaning on a very beautiful boy—I suppose Hymenæus, for the name is not written over him. In another part of the picture other

cupids are playing with the arms of Alexander, two of them carrying his spear in imitation of men carrying a heavy beam of wood ; while two others are drawing along a third seated on the shield ; another has got inside the corselet, which is on the ground, and is preparing to frighten the others when they come up to him dragging the shield.’¹

Rhodes therefore represents to us, as much as Alexandria, and in a different way, what I may call the modernness of Hellenism. Whatever jealousies and frictions the city afterwards had with Pergamum, they seem very closely related in this respect. In rhetoric, indeed, later critics remarked a clear difference between the Asianic and the Rhodian style, the latter, which professed to be derived from Æschines, being much purer, chaster, and nearer to Atticism in taste. This we should naturally expect from the older and purer origin of the city, from the better traditions of spoken Greek which it must have possessed, and from that Doric staidness which long remained a feature of its population. Alexandrian poets, such as Apollonius and Theocritus, resided there and at Cos, possibly to study purity of diction among a really Hellenic population. These considerations justify us in calling this city the eastern Athens of Hellenism.

But there was one feature in which it outshone Athens completely. I do not allude to the formation of a league of free cities far different from the maritime empire of Athens, with its oppression and its discontent. The fashion of leagues or confederations among small states was then very prevalent, and close to the Rhodians there existed one of the most curious and well developed, the Lycian League described by Strabo, on which Professor Freeman has commented with such ability.¹ I allude rather to the practice of international arbitration, of which a so far solitary case will probably come to be regarded as the highest point in the politics of our nineteenth century.²

¹ Overbeck, Schriftquellen, No. 1938. Lucian goes on to describe the obvious allegory in all this, and even to apply it to the painter’s own fortunate marriage which arose from it.

A remarkable crisis in the history of Rhodes gives us very curious evidence on the position she had attained as a neutral commercial power. The new city had already been visited with disastrous waterspouts. The form of the surrounding hills, which enclosed it like a theatre, caused sudden heavy rains to gather into torrents, and rush together down the slopes into the streets. This had happened when the city was new and only partly inhabited, and again twice later, the third flood doing great mischief, drowning no less than 500 people, who had not time to escape to roofs or high points, and threatening to tear down whole streets, which were fortunately built of stone, not of bricks, so that they resisted till part of the lower wall near the harbour gave way and let the water rush into the sea. We hear that there were special drains or outlets to meet this contingency, but that summer having set in, people became negligent, and allowed them to become stopped.³

But even this flood was a small matter to the catastrophe that happened about the year 225 B.C.⁴ An earthquake overthrew almost all the docks and public buildings, as well as

¹ Hist. of Federal Government, 213 sq.

² The Geneva arbitration between America and England on the Alabama question.

³ Diod. xix. 45. It happened about the year 315 B.C.

⁴ The authorities vary from 227 to 222 B.C. ; as Seleucus Callinicus was still alive, it appears to have been near the former date. On the other hand, the place in which the narrative of Polybius comes in the best editions puts it a little before the battle of Raphia, so that many historians are disposed to date it early in the reign of Philopator, viz. 222 B.C.

the Colossus, which broke off below the knees, and probably killed a vast number of people, though that fact is not specified. The Rhodians forthwith sent out embassies over the world to tell their misfortune and claim help, nay, they managed so well, says Polybius, that their misfortune was more than made good to them, and turned out rather a success. They, moreover, accepted the gigantic gifts of all the friendly powers rather as due to them than as favours, and greatly increased their reputation throughout the world. The list of contributions given by Polybius, which, he says, is by no means exhaustive, amounts to at least 600 talents of silver (£145,800 of our money); and the quantities of copper, lead, timber, tar, tow, wheat, ships, artillery, which were presented would certainly bring the amount to a million of our money. I give the text of Polybius from Mr. Shuckburgh's translation, which he has kindly placed at my service.¹

At the same period the earthquake occurred at Rhodes which overthrew the great Colossus and the larger part of the walls and dockyards. But the adroit policy of the Rhodians converted this misfortune into an opportunity; and under their skilful management, instead of adding to their embarrassments, it became the means of restoring their prosperity. So decisive in human affairs, public or private, is the difference between incapacity and good sense, between idle indifference and a close attention to business. Good fortune only damages the one, while disaster is but a means of recovery to the other. This was illustrated by the manner in which the Rhodians turned the misfortune that befell them to account. They enhanced its magnitude and importance: by the prominence which they gave it, and the serious tone in which they spoke of it, as well by the mouth of their ambassadors as in the intercourse of private life, they created such an effect upon other states, and especially upon the feelings of the kings, that they were not only overwhelmed with presents, but made the donors feel actually obliged for their acceptance of them.

¹ It will shortly be published by Messrs. Macmillan and Co.

Hiero and Gelo, for instance, presented them with seventy-five talents of silver, part at once and the rest at a very short interval, as a contribution towards the expenses of the gymnasium; gave them for religious purposes silver cauldrons and their stands, and water vessels: and in addition to this ten talents for their sacrifices, and ten more to compensate individual citizens; their intention being that the whole present should amount to a hundred talents.¹ Not only so, but they gave immunity from customs to Rhodian merchants coming to their ports; and presented them besides with fifty catapults of three cubits length. In spite too of these large gifts, they regarded themselves as under an obligation to the Rhodians; and accordingly erected statues in the market-place of Rhodes, representing the community of Rhodes crowned by that of Syracuse.

Then too Ptolemy offered them three hundred talents of silver, a million medimni of corn, ship timber for ten quinqueremes and ten triremes consisting of forty thousand cubits of squared pine planking, a thousand talents of bronze coinage, 180 thousand pounds of tow, three thousand pieces of sail-cloth, three thousand talents for the repair of the Colossus, a hundred master builders with three hundred and fifty workmen, and fourteen talents yearly to pay their wages. Besides this he gave twelve thousand medimni of corn for their public games and sacrifices, and twenty thousand medimni for victualling ten triremes. The greater part of these goods were delivered at once, as well as a third of the whole of the money named. In a similar spirit Antigonus [Doson] offered ten thousand timbers, varying from sixteen to eight cubits in length, to be used as purlins, five thousand rafters seven cubits long, a hundred and eighty thousand pounds of iron, sixty thousand pounds of pitch, a thousand amphoræ of the same unboiled, and besides all this a hundred talents of silver. His queen Chryseis also gave a hundred thousand medimni of corn, and a hundred and eighty thousand pounds of lead. Again Seleucus, father of Antiochus, besides granting freedom from imposts to all Rhodians sailing to his dominions, and besides giving ten quinqueremes fully equipped, and two hundred thousand medimni of corn, gave also ten thousand cubits of timber, and sixty thousand pounds of resin and hair. Nor were Prusias and Mithridates far behind these in liberality ; nor the princes Lysanias, Olympichus, and Limnæus, who were at that time in power in different parts of Asia. And as for states that according to their several abilities contributed to their assistance, it would be difficult to reckon their number. In fact, though when we regard the time which it took the city to recover its populousness, and the state of desolation from which it started, we cannot fail to be struck at the rapidity and the extent of its improvement in regard both to private and public wealth ; yet when we contemplate the natural advantages of its site, and the contributions from outside which served to raise its fortunes to their original height, this feeling must give way to a conviction that the advance was somewhat less than might have been expected.

¹ Polybius therefore reckons the value of the λέβητες and ὕδραι as five talents.

My object in giving these details is twofold. I wished to exhibit the brilliant conduct of their public affairs by the Rhodians, for indeed they deserve both to be commended and imitated, and I wished also to point out the insignificance of the gifts bestowed by the kings of our own day, and received by nations and states ; that these monarchs may not imagine that by the expenditure of four or five talents they are doing anything so very great, or expect to receive at the hands of the Greeks the honour enjoyed by former kings ; and that states, on the other hand, when they see before their eyes the magnitude of the presents formerly bestowed, may not nowadays, in return for insignificant and paltry benefactions, blindly bestow their most ample and splendid honours ; but may use that discrimination in apportioning their favours to desert, in which Greeks excel the rest of the world.

There are several curious points brought out by Droysen in his discussion of this passage, in addition to the remark of Polybius that no such gifts could be obtained from kings or states in his own day, some eighty years later. In the first place the world must have been very prosperous to afford such large benevolences. But this wealth was chiefly obtained by commerce, and of this commerce Rhodes was clearly the centre. It is plain from the quantity of silver and even of coined copper that there was no developed system of credit on paper or of state loans. To meet her obligations Rhodes must actually have ready money.

In the next place a great deal of the gifts in kind was directly intended to supply the city with efficient ships. Supposing that the ships in the docks had been destroyed, this can only mean that the Rhodian navy was still keeping the pirates in check, and was necessary to the safety of all marine trade in the Mediterranean. This is no doubt the meaning of their ships going out regularly in threes.¹ Other contributions were specially to be applied to oil and the further wants of the gymnasia, and to public feasts and processions, showing, I think, that many idle inhabitants of other capitals sojourned at Rhodes, and enjoyed the festivities and luxuries of the city, in addition to the young men who were sent there to learn business. But far more important is the clear danger of a financial crisis all over the world in case of the bankruptcy of the great trading state. It must have been a particularly safe place for depositing money, and therefore the great banking centre of the world. Each foreign state was, therefore, only protecting its own monied men in preventing a panic and the closing of the Rhodian banks.

This, however, by no means exhausts the matter. The Rhodians had for a century back been the acknowledged arbitrators and peacemakers among the nations, and if they had often failed they had often succeeded, and had been found thoroughly just and trustworthy in their decisions and their advice. We probably do not know a tithe of the cases where this was done, arbitration being an old fashion among Greek states, so much so that it was considered decent when threatening war to offer a settlement by referring the dispute to a neutral power. Such cases go back to the sixth century

¹ C. Torr, Rhodes, p. 47.

B.C. In Polybius, for example, a little later than the time of the earthquake, we have (v. 63) Ptolemy Philopator's ministers soliciting the mediation of Rhodes, Byzantium and Cyzicus, to settle his dispute with Antiochus III. We learn from an inscription¹ that an old quarrel between Samos and Priene, which had been referred to King Lysimachus, and then to Antiochus II. (Theos), who sent special envoys to examine into it, was finally referred to the Rhodians, probably about 250 B.C., who in the inscription refer to the previous arbitrations, and decide in favour of Priene.² In the days of Philip V., when we have the better information of Polybius, there seems to be no war where envoys from the free cities, especially seaport towns, with Rhodes at their head, do not appear in the rival camps and strive to make peace. It was this acknowledged office of Rhodes which was taken advantage of by the infamous Q. Marcius, when he induced the islanders to offer their mediation between Rome and Perseus, and caused them to offend the senate so mortally as to bring about their ruin.

This, then, was another, and, if I mistake not, a capital reason for the goodwill and gratitude of all the civilised world, and the determination to support the prosperity of Rhodes. I know nothing that shows us more clearly the advance of Hellenism upon Hellenedom in the solidarity of nations. Had such a catastrophe happened to imperial Athens, or Syracuse, or Tarentum, we should have heard

¹ CIG ii. No. 2905, cited by Droysen.

² See also the case in Plutarch's Aratus, c. 23, of that person making an attack on Argos in time of peace; consequently Aristippus, the tyrant of the place, cites the Achæan League, whom Aratus represented, before the arbitration of the city of Mantinea, who condemn the League to a fine of thirty minæ. So the Locrians of Opus refer to the arbitration of King Antigonus the assessment of the tribute they are forced to pay to the Ætolians. Cf. on these cases Droysen's Hellenismus, iii. 441, 447.

ports, no feeling that, apart from sea had fallen upon every city joining in

This is perhaps the best place event bearing upon the same aspect the war of the Bithynian succession founded his brilliant capital Nicomedia and introduced the general principles of istic civilisation, died (about 262 B.C.)
of children, the first grown up, testament declared, through the influence of the king, heirs to the throne, to the exclusion
In order to carry out this testament, what medes appoint? The kings of Macedonia the cities Byzantium, Heraclea, and the adjoining Hellenic free cities, among which were in mutual opposition, but like Syria, in gaining territory in Bithynia troops from all the five powers
Nevertheless the ingenious device
The eldest son, Ziaélas, invaded Bithynia Galatians, and no doubt with the support of Syria, and though the Bithynians support the king's will and the claim relations of the world that he trusts to the diplomatic rivalries and the anxiety for the balance of power of neighbouring kings and states as the best security to establish his chosen heir.

Rhodes was not drawn into this affair. As I said before, the northern or Euxine cities were not in her league, and, as we shall presently see, Byzantium at least had very opposed interests. We hear, indeed, from this period an account of the Byzantine people strongly contrasted with what we know of Rhodes. It is asserted that, though in constant dread of their Thracian neighbours, and only defending themselves against them by high walls and heavy payments, they treated their subjects on the Asiatic side as helots, while they lived a drunken and luxurious life, chiefly, we are told by Athenæus,¹ in pothouses, so that a general who was put to great straits to make them man the walls had these establishments set up close inside the fortifications.² I cannot, however, believe such things of a great trading settlement which maintained its prosperity all through its history, and at this very period could hardly have continued to exist without a great deal of vigour and ability in its leading citizens.

The account given by Polybius of its commercial war with Rhodes (219 B.C.) is so interesting, and so closely connected with the solidarity of Hellenistic trade, as I ventured to call it, that it will naturally find its place here, and very suitably close our chapter.

The Rhodians had just shown their sympathy for the

¹ x. 442. From Phylarchus.

² I remember the late Sir H. Lake, when talking about his defence of Kars with General Williams, mentioning the same habits in the Turkish officers, and how he had to go round the pothouses with a picket and turn out these officers when he saw or suspected a Russian attack in preparation.

Euxine cities by receiving an embassy from Sinope, now in danger of investment by sea and land from Mithridates. This king had been among the recent benefactors of Rhodes, and perhaps for this reason, as well as from their general policy, they sent no ships to aid Sinope, but appointed three commissioners, to whom they entrusted 140,000 drachmas (about £5000) for the purchase of supplies for its defence. They bought wine, horse-hair, gut-strings, armour, catapults, etc., which they brought to Sinope. Why had the Sinopeans not applied to Heraclea or Byzantium for aid? In the latter case at least we can furnish a reply.

‘The Byzantines,’ Polybius tells us,¹ ‘dwell in a place provided by sea with the greatest advantages for safety and wealth in all the world, but the very reverse by land. For they are complete masters of the entrance into the Euxine, so that none can sail in or out without their leave. Whatever, then, the Euxine affords the people of Byzantium can command. Now as regards the necessaries of life, as to cattle and slaves, the Pontic regions supply the most abundant and excellent qualities. As regards luxuries, they send us abundance of honey, wax, and salt-fish. They import from the south oil and wine. As to corn, it varies, sometimes they export, sometimes they import. It follows that the Greek world must either be deprived of all this, or that the trade in them become completely unprofitable, if the Byzantines were either to surrender and join with the Galatæ and the Thracians, or else give up their settlement. For, when the straits are so narrow, and the barbarians on its shores so many, the Euxine must be completely lost to us. The Byzantines, however, themselves gain most of all by the peculiarity of their position, importing and exporting all they like without trouble or danger ; they, not the less, confer great benefits on others. Being therefore, as it were, common benefactors, they should naturally receive not only thanks, but public assistance from the Greek world, as regards their dangers from the surrounding barbarians.'

¹ iv. 38, which I somewhat abridge.

'But as the peculiarities of the region are not generally known, on account of its being a little out of the beaten track of visitors,' he goes on to give a geographical description, together with a theory to account for the current out of the Black Sea, which he thinks will in the end become sweet water, and be filled up with the deposit of the great rivers which flow into it. 'For this is the peculiarity of the present age'—he wrote about 150 B.C.—'that, as every land and sea has been traversed, it will no longer do to trust poets and mythographers about strange things, as most of our forefathers have done.' He then proceeds to discuss¹ the course of the currents in the Bosphorus, showing that Byzantium is placed in the right spot, towards which the current sets from Chrysopolis on the other side, higher up the strait ; while Chalcedon is in the wrong place, and if its people want to cross to Byzantium they must ascend to Chrysopolis. This was the place, accordingly, which Alcibiades had advised the Athenians to seize, and stop the vessels coming from the Black Sea before they reached Byzantium. So also below these cities the European coast is easy to follow and is direct, while the Asiatic is inconvenient and circuitous.

'But all these advantages are well-nigh lost to the Byzantines through their disadvantages on land, for, being surrounded by Thracians, they have to sustain a perpetual war with them, which they cannot settle by any single campaign, however victorious, on account of the vast numbers of the

¹ iv. 43, 44.

moreover, tantalised by seeing can grow in the excellent land carried away as soon as the harv

I have given this extract it represents the general conc which had not advanced to th drawing in and amalgamating t but which remained essentia to barbarians. Dion Chrysost gives a very similar picture of Greek settlement on the north
There too Hellenic customs kept themselves distinct and inc fields were cultivated by armed without alarms of a Scythian r dition of the once flourishing citi very time. They were gradually decaying, through the perpetua Samnite invasions. To civilise north and west was, however, a v that solved by Alexander. For,
of all foreigners as barbarians, the

Let us now return from this digression to the narrative of Polybius.¹ 'Nevertheless, being accustomed to the Thracian war, they observed their original relations of fairness to the Greeks (in charging no dues), but when the Galatians supervened, and, having been repulsed from Delphi, came to the Hellespont, and, instead of passing over into Asia, settled round about Byzantium, and set up a sovereignty at Tyllis, then the wretched Byzantines had to pay 3000, 4000, nay up to 10,000 gold pieces, to save their territory from devastation, and at last were forced to subscribe annually eighty talents (£20,000), till the moment in question, when the Galatian king, Kauaros, was driven out, and the Galatians either exterminated or expelled by the Thracians, who were now in their turn victorious.'

I suppose they thought this change of neighbours a suitable moment to make some better terms with the Thracians, and, moreover, they must have been greatly encouraged by the late appeal of the Rhodians to the civilised world and its success. It is hardly possible that they had refused to help on this occasion, unless indeed their bad character and the heavy expenses just related offered them a good excuse, of which they soon had to repent. 'Being now pressed sore by their tribute, they first sent round embassies to the Greeks, praying for help and a contribution in their difficulties.' But they did not receive any response such as was made to Rhodes. No doubt chronic misfortunes do not affect men's minds like a sudden catastrophe. The Byzantines also had no public character like the Rhodians, who were personally respected everywhere. What was more important, Byzantium being 'a little out of the way,' as Polybius says, was not in the thoroughfare of nations and therefore by no means so important to the finance of the world. It was certainly not the locus for banks or deposits. I think too we may see in her history some jealousy of Rhodes, and a desire to be independent, which may have come out more clearly than we know when the earthquake prostrated her southern rival.

¹ iv. 46.

At all events 'when most of the cities disregarded their appeal, they felt themselves obliged to detain and levy money from Greek vessels entering the Black Sea. So when great loss and inconvenience arose to all the trading world from the toll levied by the Byzantines upon exports from the Euxine, everybody was disgusted, and all the traders laid the blame upon (or called in) the Rhodians, because they were considered the premier state in matters of shipping.'

Nothing can be more modern than all this. We could imagine an exactly similar case arising as regards the Suez Canal, if England had not her own special interests in India to protect. We can imagine some Mahdi or Arab stopping the free passage of the canal, and the states of Europe coming to England and saying: You are the principal naval power of the world: you must put a stop to this inconvenience. So the Rhodians urged to action as well by their own loss as that of their neighbours first sent embassies along with their allies demanding that the Byzantines should desist from their toll. But the Byzantines argued the case and would not give in, considering that their own chief men had the best of the discussion. So the Rhodians went home and declared war.

The method of carrying it on was not less characteristic of the age. Each sought out allies: the Byzantines sending to Antioch and Athens, the Rhodians to Phasias of Bithynia. Now Antioch was at the time at war with Athens and shut up in his capital. Athens the ally of the new king of Syria Antiochus III. afterwards the Great had begun to acting as satrap of Asia Minor for the young king, but had gradually become so powerful that he was induced to assume the purple, and was now the most powerful ruler in all Asia. Yet both these kings, though natural enemies, were ready to help the Byzantines. The Rhodians, however, checkmated their opponents by diplomacy; they did not care about Attalus, but they bought off Achæus by going to Egypt and persuading the king to give them up Achæus's father, Andromachus, who was a prisoner there, and kept as a valuable hostage (his sister had been the Syrian queen Laodike) to serve in Egyptian diplomacy. Nevertheless the Rhodians prevailed with Ptolemy, and by sending home Andromachus, conciliated Achæus, on whom the Byzantines had mainly depended. In addition, the Rhodians, without spending any amount of men or money, urged against them Prusias, King of Bithynia, grandson of the Nicomedes whose will was mentioned above, and who had succeeded his father Ziaélas at Nicomedia.

Some of the reasons given by Polybius for this king's hostility to the Byzantines are rather comical, but very characteristic of the times. Of course he was alarmed at their constant efforts to mediate between Attalus and Achæus, knowing that if these kings came to terms Achæus would probably attack him next. But furthermore he was grossly offended by their having voted him statues in their city, and then forgotten or deliberately neglected to set them up. They were also guilty of the slight of sending no deputation to worship at his great festival, the Soteria,¹ while they sent one to the analogous feast of Athene at Pergamum. The

¹ This feast was probably named after the Soteria at Delphi, which was established to commemorate the repulse of the Gauls under Brennus (A. Müller in Hermann's Antiqq. iii. 2, 385). Probably some victory of Nicomedes over the same barbarians in Asia gave an excuse for the imitation.

are interesting. Honours and st Hellenic cities were a stamp of capital like Nicomedia required t its king. While the Rhodians we of Andromachus, Prusias attacke Byzantium and gained consider time the Rhodians merely block ships, while the Byzantines endeav by sending for Prusias's uncle, 't Macedonia, to whom the kingd will, and by promoting his claim prince suddenly died; Achæus and they were sore pressed by P their Thracian neighbours. So good pretext for getting out of th mediation of the Galatian king K
we can only guess. He probabl kingdom at Tylis from the Thrac help of Byzantium.

The terms of the peace are Rhodians demand no fine, and t merely propose peace on condit levied for passing the straits. Wl intervention on behalf of trade interests carried on without hate or revenge, backed up by complicated diplomacy, and ceasing the moment the end was attained. The men who pursued this kind of politics were no longer Greeks but citizens of the world.

Such then was the Rhodes of the third century B.C., which we shall presently find abandoning its wise neutrality, and taking part in the struggles of the age. But we have not yet reached this point, though it was worth while to bring together the facts known about Rhodian diplomacy and commerce before turning back to study the social aspects of Greece.

CHAPTER XVI

THE GREECE OF ARATUS

WE have been so long occupied with the eastern portions of the Hellenistic world that we have almost lost sight of Greece itself, which all through history, in spite of the wealth and importance of Hellenic towns beyond Greece, has ever maintained its primacy as the real source and home of the world's culture. I now propose to give a sketch of the life and manners of the Greeks in Greece through the course of the third century B.C., after the settlement effected by the repulse of the Galatians, and the establishment of Antigonos Gonatas, down to the critical time when Philip V. comes to the throne, and we find ourselves under the guidance of a great authority, Polybius, who is the main exponent of later Hellenism.

I must, however, introduce the subject by recapitulating the main political movements of the day, not in detail, but so far that the reader not learned in this intricate period may be able to follow the social developments which interest him and me in the first degree.

Antigonos Gonatas had by the Chremonidean war (262 B.C.) obtained practical control of Athens. Megara was subject to him, so was Corinth, held by his nephew Alexandros, who, however, revolted to the Achæan League when the king suffered a great defeat from the Egyptians at Andros. But the widow of Alexandros was seduced by the promise of marriage with Antigonus's son, Demetrius (the Ætolian, afterwards Demetrius II., King of Macedon), and while the festivities were going on the citadel was taken by the old king knocking with his stick at the acropolis gate, which was opened by the unsuspecting garrison. He made a Stoic philosopher, Persæus, commandant of the fortress, and so seemed to have his influence over the Peloponnesus secure (245 B.C.) For the reforms of Agis were evidently too chimerical to be carried, and the cities of the Peloponnesus were divided into those free or democratic cities which belonged to the League, or those under tyrants. These men were all disposed to Antigonus, seeing that Aratus was the deadly enemy of all tyrants.

Yet withal the policy of Antigonus broke down, and he lived to see the great body of the Peloponnesians combined against him. The schemes of Agis were defeated, and his party, that of the young and the poor, was discredited. Some honourable tyrants, finding their theory of controlling Greeks by a fatherly despotism illusory, surrendered their power.¹ Shortly after Antigonus had seized Corinth in the way described it was retaken by a brilliant coup de main of Aratus, which is described in Plutarch's Life.

Thus the aged Antigonus, who was neither obstinate nor unpractical, felt obliged to recognise the Achæan League, even though it elected Ptolemy generalissimo by sea and land,—a strange step for a free confederation in Greece, but determined by the receipt of a large annual subsidy,—and died (239 B.C.), leaving his kingdom in a critical condition to his son Demetrius II., called, for some reason since forgotten, the Ætolian. The old king had no doubt intended to deal with the Achæan League, as he had done with the Ætolian, by diplomacy, but no sooner was he dead than both Leagues, though usually very hostile in interests, combined to set upon the new king of Macedonia. He was pressed by this additional difficulty that the barbarians to the north, especially the Dardanians, invaded his frontier and showed a new and unexpected power.

¹ Polyb. ii. 44. This movement had begun during Antigonus's earlier years, when he was still struggling with Pyrrhus.

The young king had therefore practically to reconquer his kingdom, and proved, like most of his house, fully equal to the task. But though he was able to defeat the Leagues, and drive the Achæans out of Northern Greece, he also used against them a new and powerful weapon destined to produce momentous results. He persuaded the Illyrians, a vigorous race of pirates dwelling on the coast of Dalmatia about Montenegro, to make expeditions and plunder the east coast of Northern Greece and Peloponnesus.¹

The invasions of these barbarians, now under Teuta, widow of King Agron, who had died in consequence of the festivities upon the return of an Acarnanian expedition, assumed larger proportions. They undertook to plunder the inland city of Phœnice in Epirus. This development caused great terror in Greece; the fleet of the Achæan League was no match for the barks of the Illyrians; the Epirotes, since they had deposed the descendants of Pyrrhus and established a federal republic of cities, were likewise helpless. Thus Macedonia was the only power which could secure the Hellenic interests against this north-eastern barbarism, and Macedonia was engaged in fierce conflict with the Dardanians, in battle with whom King Demetrius II. was slain (229 B.C.)

¹ This was first done to save the Acarnanian town of Medeon, which the Ætolians had attacked, apparently just after making peace with Macedonia (231 B.C.)

But a new solution had already been found. The Illyrian pirates had plundered everybody, and among the ships they had taken were Roman traders. When the Roman envoys complained, Teuta explained to them that the right of piracy was claimed by her subjects, and that she could only use her personal influence, not her authority, to stop it. As is well known, the younger Coruncanius told her bluntly they would soon make her improve her customs, and was murdered in consequence on his homeward journey. So came the Roman war with Illyrium, which ended in the traitor Demetrius of Pharos, the most mischievous villain of his day, obtaining as dynast most of Teuta's kingdom, while Corcyra, Apollonia, and Dyrrhachium put themselves directly under Roman protection.

In the very year, therefore, that Demetrius fell the Romans crushed the Illyrian fury, and presently sent embassies to the Ætolian and Achæan Leagues, apologising, as it were, for their interference, justifying it, and rehearsing the terms of their settlement. The Greeks responded not only by formal thanks, but by admitting the Romans to the rights and privileges of Hellenism. In contrast to other barbarians, they received at Athens and Corinth the right of access to Hellenic sanctuaries and festivals.

For the present, however, the Romans interfered no further. They had at the time no views beyond the securing of the eastern coast of Italy from raids and the safety of their traders. Presently they saw the power of the Barcides growing in Spain, and had their attention turned to Carthage and the West. We may be sure the new king or regent of Macedonia, Antigonus III., surnamed Doson,¹ perfectly understood the situation. The politics of the world was far too closely entwined for any such considerations to escape him. He would have, through Phœnicia if not directly, accounts of the progress of Carthage, from Alexandrian traders news of the power and policy of Rome. He knew that he was safe in that direction. But he was bound in the first instance to reconstruct the kingdom of Macedonia, which had, as usual, gone to pieces at the death of the last king.

We have no account of his wars till he interfered in Peloponnesus. Stray notices show that from the first he took his position as one of the great powers of the world. He conquered the northern barbarians, and presently the Ætolians, in such a way that this League never stirred against him, and left his hands free for action elsewhere. At the same time the extension of the League to cities of the Peloponnesus, and still more to cities of the Propontis, shows that he knew how to utilise it against his enemies. He supported Antiochus Hierax in his wars in Asia Minor, and even boldly seized Caria, far off from home, and directly threatening Egypt, whose once energetic king (Euergetes I.) was growing feeble, and offered him no active resistance.

Thus he strengthened himself for his recovery of Greece from the Achæan League. During the troubles of the last few years this league, under the active and astute guidance of Aratus, had spread over most of the Peloponnesus, and was growing in public importance and respect. The tyrants on whom the Macedonian policy depended were giving way to moderate democracies, and there was reason to expect that all Greece might possibly be combined in some such confederation. But Antigonos saw clearly what difficulties were in the way. Athens, whether from pride or principle, never joined the Achæan League. This was sure to prevent any spread of Aratus's influence to the north; but the chief rock upon which the League seemed certain to split was the rise of a democratic monarchy at Sparta under the gallant king Cleomenes III. Neither in war nor in policy was Aratus a match for this brilliant leader, who identified himself with the wants of the people, and showed that more real liberty and prosperity could be obtained under a wise single head, with full powers, than under an aristocratic council.

¹ He was son of Demetrius the Fair, and therefore first cousin to the late king, about thirty-four years old. We have no explanation of this title, the Promiser, vouchsafed to us. The Etym. Mag. only guesses. We know, however, that he distinctly assumed the title of king as tutor for Philip, the legitimate heir, who was only seven years old; that he deliberately postponed his own children, and married Philip's mother, that her eldest son might appear more clearly the heir. Perhaps his constant and honest assertion that he would give over the power to Philip when of age, being in those days disbelieved as quixotic, gave rise to the name.

Aratus himself would allow no other man to lead in the Achæan League. Though professing to hate and abolish tyrants, he was himself of that temper, furious if anybody else showed power and gained popularity, and quite ready to undermine any rival by treachery, even amounting to treason against the League. He got rid of Lydiades, the former tyrant of Megalopolis, who had voluntarily surrendered his city to the Achæans, in this way. He left him in the lurch in battle, and saw him overpowered before his eyes.

But all his chicanery and duplicity failed before the boldness and honest enthusiasm of Cleomenes. The League fell to pieces, partly by conquest, partly by defection to the Spartan king. In the end Aratus had himself nominated uncontrolled dictator—in other words, tyrant—of the remainder. Nor did his acts belie this title, of which he had professed such theatrical abhorrence. Yet even this did not save him. He must add the meanness of a traitor, the ingratitude of a politician, to his other crimes. Betraying his country, betraying his paymaster the King of Egypt, who had long given him a salary to oppose the power of Macedon in Greece, he brought about an alliance with Antigonos which put Corinth and its citadel into the king's hands, and once more made Macedon master of Greece.

So began the famous Cleomenic war of Antigonos Doson against Sparta, which the Macedonian protracted for three years, while negotiating with Ptolemy the surrender of his new ally in Greece. For when abandoned by Aratus, Egypt naturally looked to Cleomenes to maintain the anti-Macedonian interests. With subsidies from Egypt, the Spartan king, a first-rate general, was dangerous, and might have been victorious. Without subsidies, he must succumb, even if victorious in a battle. Antigonos appears to have ceded Caria, in return for an undertaking on the part of Egypt to abandon Cleomenes. Thus Doson was victor without fighting, merely by protracting the campaign, and we only wonder why he fought the battle of Sellasia (221 B.C.)

That battle, however, and the flight of Cleomenes to Egypt, made the Macedonian conspicuously the master of Greece, which he ordered exactly as seemed best to him. Aratus was merely his servant, the Ætolians powerless against him, Sparta crushed, Athens of no account. The great Punic war was on the eve of breaking out, and the Romans fully occupied.

But on his hurried return to meet a new raid of Illyrians, many of whom had fought under his banner at Sellasia, and whom he now defeated easily in battle, shouting and excitement caused him to burst a blood-vessel, and he died in the prime of his manhood and his fame. The death of this great man, who alone could have met and controlled Roman influence in the Greek peninsula, makes a real turning-point in history. In Syria and Egypt too the thrones changed hands, and Polybius very justly adopts this crisis (about 221 B.C.) as the opening of his great work. Here, then, we pause, and turn to the details which are our chief concern. What were the political ideas which permeated Greek society? What were the current notions of morals and of manners? What trace have we of the intellectual aspirations of the age? To these questions we must attempt what answer our scanty documents admit.

The Political Notions of the Day.—We must consider the various states of Greece as having come to a settled condition in comparison with the agitated period at the beginning of the century. The great wars for the supremacy of the world were over. The great knight-errants among both Diadochi and Epigoni had passed away. Pyrrhus of Epirus was the last of them, and Ptolemy Euergetes, when he had conquered the whole East, had not dreamt for one moment of universal sovereignty. The limits of both first and second rate powers in the Hellenistic world were pretty well determined, and though there were many wars, and many attempts of ambitious men to extend their dominion, it was as distinctly within limits as is now the case in Europe. As Germany never proposed to absorb France after the late war, but merely diminished her power by taking away boundary provinces and exacting an indemnity, so Ptolemy did not dream of absorbing Syria, though he took care to weaken her. In like manner no king would have ventured to enslave the free cities of Asia Minor, or the population of Greece, however he might desire to extend his power over them and make them contribute men and money to his wars, or promise to give no aid to his foes.

This is what I mean by saying that Greece had reached a settled condition. No one thought of destroying Thebes, or annexing Bœotia, or making Athens the dependency of a foreign power, or annexing Arcadia or Elis. On the other hand, all these states or cities were subject to invasion and loss in the way of raid, or of passing armies, unless they provided themselves with some better protection than the hurried calling out of a citizen militia. For not only were there trained armies of mercenaries always afoot, but there was a great deal of systematic piracy, especially on the east coast of Greece, where not only the terrible Illyrians but the wild Ætolians refused to settle down to orderly life; just as in Asia Minor the Galatæ were for all these years the scourge of the smaller powers. Small republics, therefore, became highly inconvenient to live in, if they were really independent, and stood isolated from their neighbours.

The political remedies for this altered condition of things were various. The little city-state must either formally put itself under the protection of a greater power, which then sent a detachment of troops and a military governor to ensure safety and order; or it must entrust this duty to one of its own citizens, who could thus hardly avoid becoming superior to the laws, and assuming what was known as tyranny; or lastly it could enter what was known as a System, or political combination of many small states, and purchase its security by abandoning a certain portion of its sovran powers.

The first solution was least in favour, and it was always considered a recovery of liberty when the military governor and his garrison disappeared, however moderate and well conducted he may have been. Of course the chances of such a garrison being really kept in order were small, and even where we hear of honourable governors, like those of the Macedonians at Athens and Persæus at Corinth, there may have been frequent outrage or petty tyranny on the part of the soldatesca, idle and wanton in times of peace, and always prone to despise the civilian and disturb the regularities of citizen life.

The second solution was one of perpetual recurrence all over the Greek world, perhaps now more than ever, since monarchy had not only been proved by gigantic facts to be the most splendid kind of government, but had been recommended by the philosophers in many tracts as the most rational solution of the difficulty. Polybius specially notes that such men as Lydiades were carried away by vain theories and speculations on the excellence of government by One. The theorists seem not to have observed that what was monarchy in empires was tyranny in separate cities. Such a kingdom as Macedon, or Egypt, or Syria could not possibly be then controlled by a republican assembly or a system of federation. The elements were too disparate, the means of communication too slow, the necessity of military control too urgent; but these cogent reasons did not subsist in a state of ten miles square.

Moreover, the deep-rooted sentiment in these Greek cities made it impossible that such a government, called a tyranny, however just and gentle the absolute ruler might be, could remain stable and equable. Even if the great majority of citizens might acquiesce, there were enthusiasts who thought tyrannicide the highest virtue, rivals who claimed an equal right to command, disappointed suitors who ascribed their losses to the injustice of the irresponsible judge, and in no case did public sentiment brand the upsetting of this form of government as either a murder or a political crime. The recent tyrants of Sicyon were mostly good men, says Strabo; they had raised the wealth and importance of the town by making it an acknowledged art centre, yet they perished in succession by violence. While, therefore, many must have been persuaded that tyranny was far better than ochlocracy, and the innumerable tyrannies set up in Greek cities show how general must have been the feeling that it was a reasonable solution, still the bulk of conservative opinion and the whole body of literature which has survived have declared themselves against it. The tracts in favour of monarchy seem the outcome of a special moment in Hellenistic history—the earlier half of the third century—and they have all perished.

There remains the third and at the time most fashionable expedient, that of a combination of city states, maintaining individual freedom with a military and political power able to withstand the larger kingdoms which threatened the independence, if not the existence, of every petty dominion. It was in the variation in the amount of central control and of separate independence that the contrasts lay among the many systems that sprang up in this century. There was an old and well-known form which had been long repudiated, that of a capital city like Athens or Thebes ruling dependent towns, with the right or the power of interfering in the affairs of each. The subject towns were always discontented, and always ready to break loose and join any rival power. This was no Federation, but the Empire of a city republic, with all separate liberties sacrificed to the interests of the central power.

The most complete contrast to this was the Ætolian League, which did not trouble itself in the least about the internal arrangements of its members, which would embrace tyrants as well as republics, far-off seaports on the Propontis as well as neighbouring mountain tribes, with the mere understanding that if they paid a certain contribution (fixed by agreement or arbitration) to the central government they would receive prompt military assistance when required, and if plundered by members of the League, redress by an appeal at Thermus, the capital of the League.

Polybius has represented this league as a mere collection of villains, associating for plunder, with the law that every member had a right to share in booty when it was to be had, even from an allied city. It reminds us of the grotesque proposal of Hadji Stavros in About's Roi des Montagnes, that by proper organisation no traveller should be able to land in Greece without paying black-mail to the associated klephts. But of course it is mere nonsense to assert that all the virtues were on the side of the Achæans, and all the vices on that of the Ætolians. The Achæans often made alliance with them, so did the King of Macedon, and other states. Had they been mere marauders levying black-mail they would not have gained or maintained a position higher than the Illyrians, and would probably have been put down by the common action of the Hellenistic world. On the contrary, their capital was the home of art and splendour; they ranked thoroughly as Greeks; they had even stood forth as national heroes against the Galatians; their arbitration was often offered and accepted by other states; so that we must correct the estimate which has passed from Polybius into modern histories on this point.

The Ætolians, who organised mercenary service for the Hellenistic world, and were ready to supply any belligerent power from Sicily to Bactria with good officers and brave soldiers, must have had considerable cosmopolitanism at Thermus, which made it a peculiar place. There must have been Indian, Persian, and Egyptian luxuries among their spoils and rewards, and many of the material refinements of the East must have found their way to the homes of the great chiefs who controlled the League by their influence, if not in formal council, at its general assemblies. They made the fortune of their state by having a large population, hardy and poor, ready to serve for pay at the opening of the forty-five years' war, and they remained, till the absorption of Greece in the Roman Republic, the most important confederacy in northern Hellas.

The Achæan League was a far more advanced and interesting political development, which we know fairly well through Polybius, and upon which Professor Freeman has given us a masterly volume.¹ I will not here repeat the details, which are still of the highest interest, especially to Swiss and American politicians, as I am not writing political history, but will merely point out how a constitution apparently democratic, for every citizen of every town in the League could come and vote at the general assemblies, was turned into an aristocratic one by the fewness of these assemblies, their short duration (three days), and the arrangement that the votes went by cities. This was necessary to prevent the locus of the assembly from carrying everything, but on the other hand a dozen men, who had time and means to do it, could come from the remotest member of the League and represent a whole city.

The gradual and almost accidental growth of the League led, moreover, to grave difficulties, which were never overcome. The original members were small and obscure towns. In course of time they succeeded in attracting great cities like Corinth, and it was clearly unreasonable that little Achæan townships should count as much in the councils of the League, while on the other hand the original members, the mother-states of the League, felt that their own dignity and lawful precedence were not to be transferred to new and doubtful members. This distinction—that of mothers and daughters of the Union—came out often when the right of secession or of independent action was mooted. It will be in the memory of many how the same distinction was felt in America, perhaps more felt than expressed. Such States as Virginia, which had originally come together voluntarily into the Union, felt quite a different right to secede from that of California or other States created as new centres of life by the Union as their mother.

¹ Hist. of Federal Government, vol. i. Macmillan, 1863. It is earnestly to be desired that this most valuable book should be republished in a cheap form. It has long been out of print.

But it was the assertion of independent action in external affairs, quite destructive to any real league, and engrained in the autonomic instincts of the people, which ultimately sapped the Achæan power. Another flaw in this league was its military weakness. It was not able to keep up a mercenary force without constant subsidies from Egypt, which Aratus secured. But its principle was to have a citizen militia, and without such a general as Cleomenes or Philopoemen, which Aratus was not, a citizen militia was perfectly unable to cope with a professional army. Aratus was as weak in the field as he was strong in surprises; as weak in large policy as he was strong in all the wiles of diplomacy. His great and continuous influence was directed, first of all, to keep down all personal rivals, next to keep them down as exponents of a democratic policy; for Aratus represented the rich and the conservative part of the population, at a time when socialistic doctrines were abroad, and the land question was constantly threatening.

This movement, long since visible in the voting of the democracies of low franchise, was now reinforced by the appearance of a new champion, the brilliant King of Sparta. His predecessor Agis had already shown the way; he had openly proposed communistic doctrines, the abolition of debts, the redistribution of land, and all this under the guise of Lycurgean principles. He had failed by attempting to persuade his opponents, or to overrule them by political action. Cleomenes saw that a downright revolution was necessary; that the ephors must be, not deposed, but abolished or put to death, and the full power seized by one thorough reformer. He was undoubtedly a tyrant in the real sense, and so he was often called. But he had the inestimable sentimental advantage of being legitimate king and a Heracleid, whereas the rest were upstarts. Hence his advocacy of democratic principles, his declaration that he would support democracies and the poor if they would give him soldiers, his readiness to abolish oligarchies, and to stand forth in the perfectly novel position of a Spartan king leading the radical and socialistic democracy of the age.

The Lives of Aratus and of Cleomenes by Plutarch will give the general reader sufficient detail as to the position of these typical men, and I shall therefore not dilate upon the politics of the day further, but proceed to the evidence of other kinds which we have of the life of this age.¹

¹ Our knowledge of Cleomenes comes from partisan sources, but fortunately from both sides of a great quarrel. Polybius, no doubt using the Memoirs of Aratus, whom he delights to honour, is very adverse to the Spartan king, as being the great and successful opponent of the aristocratic Achæan League. On the other hand, Plutarch and others have also used Phylarchus, and perhaps some other historians to whom Cleomenes was a great hero and Aratus little better than a traitor. Hence we have a pretty complete picture of this famous personage supplied us by his ardent friends and bitter enemies.

CHAPTER XVII

THE INNER LIFE OF THE PERIOD

LET us consider first what progress the serious side of life had made, the attitude of philosophy towards religion, and the condition of religion in serious society ; then what had been done for education in those days ; lastly the recreations of the time, especially dramatic affairs and public festivals, including art and artists.

When we come to compare the position of philosophy with what it was in the opening period of Hellenism (above, chap. vi.) we find many remarkable contrasts. The age of great new systems has gone by. There is no longer a Zeno and an Epicurus, but rather established schools of thinking, which declare themselves of a particular creed and undertake to preach it to the world. Along with these practical preachers, who were itinerant, and made sojourns in many cities, we have those, like Chrysippus, who systematised the doctrines of the great masters. 'No Chrysippus' (it was said), 'no Stoa.' For like the dogmatic theologians who gathered the sayings of Christ and the Apostles and made them into a system of religion, with definitions and with creeds, so Chrysippus systematised the thoughts and writings of Zeno and Cleanthes. We even hear of an editor of Stoic works at Pergamum, Athenodorus, who omitted what he thought inexpedient, and took strange liberties with their texts.

With Chrysippus, too, came those speculative questions which are not attended to by the great masters of practical teaching. Was it possible to attain to righteousness in some respects and fail in others? or must a man be altogether good when he once found peace? If he kept the whole law and offended in one point, was he guilty of all? Again, was conversion to philosophy a gradual thing, as Aristotle had preached, attained by good habits and moral training? or was it sudden? and did it come like a revelation in a moment? I need hardly say that the latter doctrine was then, as it now is in our religion, the popular view.¹ Men like to know and count the moments in every great event, and to assign as the efficient cause some accident which is only one link in a long and hidden chain.

Again, it was discussed by the theologians—for such I may really call them—whether falling away, whether apostasy was really possible if you had once reached the truth. On this the Stoic doctors differed. Chrysippus said yes; Cleanthes no.² Again, what were our duties to the lower animals? Had they claims upon our justice and mercy like men, or were they of no account, owing to their difference of nature? Does this apply to the lowest stages of humanity?³ Is political justice opportunism, or is it based on eternal principles?

¹ Cf. Diogenes Laertius on the sudden conversion which produced various well-known philosophers, e.g. (iv. 7) Polemo, a dissolute youth, came in drunk and crowned with garlands to a lecture of Xenocrates, who went on without noticing the disturbance. He was speaking of self-control (σωφροσύνη); and by his eloquence the youth was forthwith converted. There are other like cases mentioned.

² Diog. Laert. vii. 1, § 125 sq. ³ Diog. Laert. loc. cit. and x. § 150.

Such were the subjects discussed all over Greece in thousands of lectures and tracts, but most of all in the established schools of Athens, where men who agreed on the general principles of the philosophic life quarrelled violently over details of doctrine. But even these disputes seem to have settled down a good deal. The Epicurean was no longer a heretic, to be crushed by violent denunciation or exile, nor was the Cynic now a mere solitary madman. The itinerant preachers of all these doctrines met and lived in peace and in mutual respect, just as Episcopalian, Presbyterian, and Methodist ministers now meet without difficulty, and each can respect the religion and the morals of the other. This was so much the case that we hear¹ of King Antigonus Gonatas supplying ample funds for a philosophic feast (to commemorate his son Halcyoneus), at which the various schools were represented. It seems they had not the good manners to refrain from controversy at table, which Arcesilaus, for one, deprecated. He was a well-bred man, and one of those who valued previous culture; but many of those present were men of low birth and ill-breeding, as we may see in Diogenes's account of their origin. Still they were ready to meet one another, and we can hardly even say that an exception was made in the case of Epicureans or of sceptics, for whatever their heresies in doctrine, they pursued the same kind of life as the rest. Indeed, the Cynics of this time distinctly preached on a basis of scepticism and pessimism. They went about, like the Franciscan monks in the Middle Ages, recommending poverty and abstinence from the pleasures of life as the real secret of liberty and perfect independence.

There was a general desire to hear about these things,

¹ Diog. Laert. iv. § 41; v. § 68.

even if men did not adopt the full requirements of the preacher. People liked to have such men in their cities, and thought them excellent for the youth to attend. Moreover, it was not new doctrines or heresies which were required, but a full exposition of what the great masters had said, what Zeno or Epicurus or Diogenes had thought, and we see ample evidence in the fragments of one of these Cynical preachers—Teles—that every effort was made to show that the new doctrine was in harmony with the old laws of morals, as laid down in Homer and the gnomic poets. As we might expect, conversions from one sect of philosophy to another were not common or reputable, nevertheless they did occur in some notable cases.¹ I do not see that the various schools tried hard to make proselytes from one another, but rather converts from the world. Controversies they had, of course, but these were within the schools and not a religious propaganda, like our public controversies with Romanism.

It is probably in connection with the rise of the philosophical schools or colleges at Athens that we may best explain the notable changes in the higher education of the youth both at Athens and elsewhere in Greece. When I say Colleges of the philosophers, I mean to suggest that the various seats of learning at Athens, being the gift of founders or patrons, were well kept buildings with ornamental gardens. So that city, becoming gradually, with the loss of its political importance, a centre of education and culture, gave more and more attention to these academies, and the gardens of the Epicureans and Peripatetics became not only an agreeable and fashionable retreat for quasi-

¹ It was remarked that conversions were not uncommon to Epicureanism, but never from it. On this Arcesilaus remarked sarcastically ἀνδρας ἀν' εὐνούχους γενέσθαι, but not vice versa.

studious youth but a frequent resort of the professional tourist and idler.¹

These schools confined themselves to the deepest mental and moral problems. They taught religion and faith, but did not trouble themselves about the physical or æsthetical perfection of man any more than our ordinary preachers do nowadays. The Stoics even disliked a pupil below the age of mature manhood, counting youth the time of passion, when wisdom was not attainable. Accordingly it was plain that something must be organised for young people, especially for young people of wealth and importance, whose parents desired to send them from the outer parts of Hellenism to season themselves with the true Attic salt of artistic and literary culture.

For Athens was becoming poor, and in that decaying condition when men began to look about for something 'to bring money into the country,' and to consider that inducing rich people to reside and spend was a real substitute for the productive energy which compels money to come in as a return for adequate value. When the kings and nobles of Macedon, or the dynasts of Asia Minor, were willing to send their sons to Athens, and to give large endowments by way of honorarium, it was natural that the Athenians should adapt themselves to the situation, and arrange a system to meet the new demand.

For this purpose they seem to have modified the old system of advanced education, which ordained that from the age of eighteen to twenty Athenian youths, whose parentage and qualifications were ascertained, should remain under state supervision, and do the duty of patrols (περίπολοι) round the outlying parts and frontier forts of Attica, receiving at the same time drill in military exercises, as well as some gymnastic and literary training. These youths wore a short black mantle, as a sort of military undress, and were of special prominence in religious pomps and processions, such as that which adorned the frieze of the Parthenon. Nevertheless, earlier Greek literature contains but few allusions to them, and the technical terms for such a youth, ephebus, and for the institution of their training, ἐφηβεία, hardly occur, I think, earlier than Xenophon. The theories of Plato presuppose it, as indeed was natural, for not only at Sparta but in many parts of Greece some similar arrangement had long been sanctioned.

¹ Cf. above, p. 196.

It is, however, only from the year 307 B.C. that the inscriptions about ephebi begin, and from that time onward they are very numerous. Then the ephebi become everywhere an important section, and even corporation, of the citizens; there are public decrees in honour of their conduct on special occasions; they have special places in the theatre; there are decrees in honour of their supervisors or directors (κοσμηταί), and also lists of these persons. The citizens of course predominate; out of a probable total of 240¹ (at Athens) there are not more at first than 10-20 ξένοι. But, of course, these latter were important people, and we find that on the analogy of the trierarchy, which obliged rich citizens to fit out a ship, and imposed this duty rather as a pecuniary burden than a naval distinction, so the duty of supplying the necessaries for the gymnasia in the way of oil, etc., was entrusted to a gymnasiarch, who might be one of the pupils themselves, if he were not one of the overseers or teachers. We find, accordingly, special thanks awarded for the performance of this burden, which sometimes was undertaken by several people conjointly.¹ The gradual accession of rich strangers also produced other modifications in the old Athenian practice. Of course the duty of acting as περίπολοι, or frontier police to guard Attica, could not be expected from these strangers, and a good many of the old gymnastic exercises had become antiquated and out of fashion. Many of the philosophers, as well as warriors, like Alexander and Philopœmen, even inveighed against spending people's time in training for athletic contests, and Chrysippus even wrote a book against them. On the other hand, both citizens of Athens and strangers began to lay more stress on higher education of the mind, and in addition to the old training in the liberal arts and in literature there were now the philosophic systems, which could no longer be ignored.

¹ This is a high total. There is evidence (Grasberger, Erziehung und Unterricht, iii. 63, 91) that the average number was about 140. The phrase ἐθνή and ἐθνῶν τάγματα were used for the non-Athenian youths.

To meet these altered conditions we find that the duration of the epheby was ultimately reduced from two years to one, and most of the gymnastics and military training was left out. They had once been the chief thing; now they gradually became subordinate to the musical and literary instruction. This we know as well from other sources as from the scale of salaries given to the various teachers, according to extant inscriptions.² Moreover the military training

¹ So masters of hounds in our day undertake heavy burdens (which are sometimes divided and managed by committees), and earn the thanks of their comrades in the sport, even when the expenses are partly defrayed by public subscriptions.

² I give the main provisions of an inscription from Teos, possibly of later date than our period, but of the same spirit :—

It is further decreed to nominate, as soon as the gymnasiarchs are chosen, a master of the boys (παιδονόμον) not under forty years of age. But in order that all free-born boys may be educated according to the splendid bequest (34,000 drachmas) of Polythrus, there are to be chosen yearly three masters to teach boys and girls, to be paid 600, 550, and 500 drachmas respectively. Besides this, two gymnastic trainers (παιδοτρίβας) at 500 drachmas each. Besides a teacher of the cithara or player, and to the man elected 700 drachmas per annum. This itself underwent suitable changes. We have a set of ephebi thanked in an inscription¹ for having maintained at their own cost and repaired a piece of heavy artillery, and made the use and practice of it available. I cannot interpret in any other way the allusion of Festus (sub voc. rutum) to the practising the throwing up of sand with a shovel. It must soon have been plain to the Greeks that earthworks resisted battering better than stone walls, and so in this respect too the ephebic training was modified. Artillery, as we know, was now of capital importance, and καταπελταφασία, 'artillery practice,' becomes common in the enumeration of the items of military training.

It is part of the same development that we should see teaching specialised, and separate trainers appointed for each kind of exercise, bodily or mental. Then begins the same subdivision of labour which has taken place in our schools in the present century, since a number of new subjects have crept into the programme of education.² This point is specially noticed by Philostratus (c. 15) in his tract on person is to instruct boys both in their first and in their second (and last) years in singing and playing the cithara and lyre, but the ephebi in singing. If there be an intercalary month, he is to be paid a corresponding proportion of his salary. The Paidonomos and gymnasiarch are to pay the fencing master, and the instructors in the use of the bow and the spear under sanction of the community. The teachers afore-named are to instruct the ephebi and the boys appointed to learn singing, and are to be paid as follows: the teacher of shooting and darting 250 drachmas, and the fencing master 300, the latter to give lessons for at least two months. But if the teachers of language (grammar and literature) make representations that the number of pupils is excessive, the Paidonomos shall decide on the matter, and they shall carry out his decision. The examinations, which were held in the gymnasium, the teachers of language and music shall hold in the council-house (Cf. Grasberger, Erziehung und Unterricht, etc., iii. 311). The predominance of musical and literary over physical training is here perfectly clear.

¹ Grasberger, op. cit. iii. 168, note.

² Grasberger, op. cit. p. 213.

gymnastics. Now too we may safely infer that the special aptitudes of pupils became noted and developed, though we have to search all the way down to Julian for an allusion to a sort of conservatoire of music at Alexandria, where poor boys with a good natural voice were supported and trained.¹

This tendency was naturally strengthened by the growth of competitions, which we find even in the shape of school-examinations with prizes,—that old vice of pandering not only to the ambition of children but to the vanity of elders. We hear even of examinations held to test the qualification for a post.² We have also the show day; the children reciting or exhibiting before the perspiring parents; nay, even prize exercises being published by being inscribed on stone. But this performance, so far as we know, is of later date.

We still have to consider the private life and clubs of the university students, for so we must call the ephebi. In the first place, the system was spread all over the Hellenistic world, even as far as Massilia, a Greek town in the barbarous West. We know that Tarsus had for centuries a school of repute. M. Collignon has collected, in a special tract on the traces of ephebic institutions outside Athens, the inscriptions of other towns which mention the practice.³ He has found that from nearly sixty cities, scattered over Macedonia, Greece, the Isles, Asia Minor, Syria, we possess this evidence. In innumerable other cases it is mere accident which has deprived us of it. The extant details show us also a great unity of type, for even in the case of Sparta, where the details varied, and strangers, for example, were never admitted, the regulations called Lycurgean were in the main of the same complexion and designed to attain the same objects. Indeed the admission of the so-called μόθακες and τρόφιμοι to the training shows that the rule of Spartan restriction was relaxed to include the only outsiders likely to require this education.¹

¹ Grasberger, Erziehung und Unterricht, p. 307.

² Grasberger, op. cit. p. 329. ἀγῶνες is the word for competitive examination, ἀπόδειξις for a public exhibition or speech day, θήματα for prizes, of which there were generally a first and second, and διακωδωλίζειν, for testing by examination.

³ Grasberger, pp. 64, 65.

It is in this public attention to education that Polybius, the first competent observer of Greek and Roman life together, sees the great contrast between Italy and Greece. He cannot understand how so important a matter can be left to individuals with every chance of neglect and mismanagement. We shall see, in due time, how far this criticism was well founded.

We must, therefore, imagine to ourselves the ephebi of every considerable Greek town at this period marked out as a special class, with a right to special places in the theatre, wearing a distinctive dress, and clearly of social importance from the unity and combination of their order. They correspond to the undergraduates of Oxford or Dublin, perhaps still more to the students in such towns as Leipzig or Leiden, who make themselves felt on every public occasion, and whose manners are of a recognised type. They were organised within themselves too in certain clubs and associations, and had their dignities and offices, with titles copied from the high offices of state. There was a ruler, I suppose like the senior Prefect at Winchester, called archon at Athens, a general, a king, and so forth. Their traditional usages were called laws (νόμος), their meetings assemblies (ἀγορά), their resolutions decrees (ψηφίσματα). In the city of Pergamum we even hear of 'the council and commonwealth of the youths' (ἡ βούλη καὶ ὁ δῆμος τῶν νέων) as a separate corporation meeting in their own gymnasium.

¹ Grasberger, pp. 59, 60.

The dates of the inscriptions recording these things are not often to be fixed with certainty, and many of them may be subsequent to the times of Aratus, which we are describing. But there can be no doubt that the type of Hellenistic education was then fixed, and that many of the details attested by only later documents owe their origin to the first century of Hellenism.

The common club or meeting-ground of these youths was naturally the gymnasium, where all the appointments for athletic exercises, as well as for resting in the shade, in fact for southern out-of-door life, were provided, and it was originally in the gymnasia called the Academy, the Kynosarges, and the Lykeion, that the body of the Athenian students spent their days. Hence it was natural that those philosophers who did not, like the Stoics, despise teaching youths, should set up their schools close beside these gymnasia; and such was the case. When any foreign youth, especially a foreigner who had been enrolled as an ephebus, wished to substitute serious studies for the rhetoric formally included in the course, he could turn without delay into the museum or college beside the gymnasium. During the period before us these gymnasia and philosophic schools were outside the city. But two new ephebic gymnasia had been established within the walls by the liberality of Ptolemy Philadelphus and of a condottiere named Diogenes, who was bought off from the forts of Athens by Aratus, and who left this endowment to Athens.¹ When king Philip V. presently devastated and ruined all the suburbs of Athens (200 B.C.) the intramural gymnasia became the most important, and the Ptolemæon and Diogeneion are those usually mentioned in our inscriptions.

¹ He was the military governor of Athens under king Demetrius II., and held for him Piræus, Munychia, Salamis, and Sunion. When that king was killed in 229 B.C. Aratus succeeded in persuading him to evacuate them for 150 talents. There was a feast ever after in his honour as a benefactor.

The great modification, however, in the whole spirit of education was, as I have already said, the altered balance between gymnastic and music (in the wide Greek sense). While in older times the perfecting of the body had been chief, now it was the mind which took the first place, and as I pointed out that the nature of military training altered with the conditions of the age, so the character of musical and literary training altered also. Formerly rhetoric had been the great thing, that is to say perfect form in speaking, as the greatest lever of power in the affairs of a democracy, where public speaking was the paramount force. Nowadays oratory, though still prized and admired, was only an ornamental accomplishment, and the philosophers, with their serious thinking and their retirement from public life, had played havoc with the pre-eminence of formal perfection in speaking. Hence we find an incredibly rapid decay of oratory, even in the city where the elders could remember the fresh traditions of Demosthenes, Æschines, and Hyperides. The passages quoted from the Phalerean Demetrius with ecstasy by Polybius would not have passed muster as average specimens in the better ages, and the next famous rhetorician, Hegesias, whom we mentioned above (p. 315 sq.), is held by good critics never to have composed a decent page of eloquence.

But if the æsthetic side of Greek education was not as formerly sustained by the study of rich and brilliant oratory, perhaps this loss was to some extent compensated by the greater diffusion of theatrical and musical entertainments which attain to quite a new and distinct position in this age. We know that the building of theatres had become common all over Greece, even in third-rate towns; there is still a curious specimen extant in the steep little theatre of Chæronea, which could only hold a very small audience.¹ These theatres were, moreover, all the more general, since they came to be used for the public meetings of the citizens, as appears from the instances of Syracuse and Athens. Nowhere, however, may we suppose that the theatre was confined to this political use. In all of them there were musical, dramatic, and orchestric performances held at the feasts in honour, not only of Dionysus, but of other gods. Thus at Delphi there was established by the Ætolians, in commemoration of the victory over the Galatæ, a great festival called the Soteria, which was first held about 260 B.C., and to which artists came from distant parts of the Hellenistic world.

Inscriptions reveal to us the existence of guilds of professionals who went about Greece to these local feasts, and performed for very high pay.² These people, who had once been called play-actors or singers, were now called 'artists attached to the god Dionysus' (οἱ περὶ τὸν Διόνυσον τεχνῖται), and were enrolled in corporations which gave them special privileges, such as freedom from military service and from taxes, as well as from imprisonment as sureties. Whoever violated their privileges was brought, we are told, before the officers of the Amphictyony of Delphi. We find too that they were allowed to wear gold ornaments, when this was forbidden to the citizens, and they were no doubt an ostentatious and not very respectable class, in spite of all the privileges of the laws and the favours of society. In Aristotle's Problems (30, 10) the question is asked: 'Why are the Dionysiac artists generally bad characters (πονηροί)? Is it not because they are debarred from the pursuit of wisdom by their constantly being tied to their business, and because they live most of their time in extravagance, sometimes again in positive want, both of which are productive of worthlessness?'

¹ Cf. my Rambles and Studies in Greece, third edition, p. 228.

² A troupe of comedians (including tragic actors) at Corcyra got 50 minæ (about £200) for an engagement, according to an inscription (A. Müller, Bühnenalterthümer (vol. v. of Hermann's Antiquities), p. 409, note), and this was probably not exceptionally high pay.

Their corporation included a priest (of Dionysus) at the head, who still remained a performer; a treasurer; dramatic poets of new tragedies and comedies and odes; principal actors of both tragedy and comedy, who brought out the old masterpieces of Euripides and Menander; and musicians and singers of various kinds. They had impresarios, who managed engagements of a 'caste' for distant towns; acting managers (ἐργολάβοι), who arranged the performances; and even special costume-hirers (ἱματιομίσθαι), who supplied the 'properties' for the stage. No great festival, except the four national ones, was thought complete without the presence of these artists, and in the end musical contests came in even at the Pythian and Nemean games. At the others, the chief of the troupe of artists was always a leading member of the committee of management of the festival, and the salaries paid, apart from the prizes offered for the competitions, were very considerable. Thus when old Antigonos was celebrating, with great pomp, the inaugural feast of his new capital, Antigoneia on the Orontes, and heard of the invasion of Asia Minor by Lysimachus (303 B.C.), he broke up the feast, but paid the artists their honoraria, not less, says Diodorus (xx. 108), than 200 talents. We hear of Dionysia all over the Hellenistic world.¹ It is told in Plutarch's Life of Cleomenes that on one of his campaigns he met with a company of artists crossing the Peloponnesus, and that he forthwith made arrangements with them to have a temporary stage, and dramatic entertainments for his soldiers. Being non-belligerents, and allowed to pass any frontier even in war,¹ we do not wonder at their being often employed by kings and dynasts as informal envoys, and their attachments to the Hellenistic courts were manifold. One association of actors called itself the attalists, and offered sacrifices to Eumenes II. and even to his brothers. We have in an inscription from Ptolemais, in Upper Egypt, details of a corporation of artists there also, showing how universal the fashion became. Perhaps a list of the salaries or prizes, which indicate the various ranks of actors, from an extant inscription, though of Roman times, will interest the reader. In one the tragic protagonists receive as prizes 2500, 600, 350 denarii (about equal to francs), the comic protagonists 1500, 500, 300. In others the Pythauls and Citharistes receive 1000 denarii, the choraules and chorocitharist 1500; the encomiograph (writer of laudatory notices!), the epic and the tragic poets, 750 each, the comic poet 500, the manager of the old comedies 350. These latter sums are salaries, the former, where three plays competed, prizes.²

¹ See the list of towns, where they are attested by inscriptions in A. Müller's Bühnenalterthümer, p. 378, notes. The dramatic corporations of Teos and of Pergamum seem to have been rich, and endowed by large private bequests.

Those who consider this body of facts, recently recovered (from inscriptions, showing the high consideration in which a class of people morally and intellectually insignificant was held on account of their purveying the public with recreation, will see how modern and even senile the culture of Hellenism had become. There was still the old respect for religious forms. All the oaths of ephebi or of artists are in the name of many gods, with strange names and curious attributes.¹ The marble chair granted to the chiefs of the artists' company at the theatre of Athens—a sort of reserved pit-stall—was reserved for them as priests of Dionysus, not as players, so that neither serious philosophers nor gay men of the world were disposed to quarrel with the received New Testament, or cult of the great Hellenic gods, still less with the received Old Testament, or legendary history, which supplied all the most popular subjects for sculpture, painting and poetry. There was even, as we have seen in our sketch of Alexandrian poetry, a growing fashion of expounding and explaining all these stories, chiefly, I suppose, on account of their close relation to classical art.

¹ These privileges are already alluded to by Demosthenes in several places.

² Cf. A. Müller's Bühnenalterthümer, p. 413, note.

But as it was the actor and not the priest who was esteemed, so the list of salaries just quoted shows us that it was the performer and not the producer, the virtuoso and not the composer, who occupied the chief place in the favour of society. The sculptor, the play-actor, the harpist, the painter, instead of being mere honourable tradesmen, esteemed but modestly rewarded by the higher classes—such was the position of the makers of the Parthenon—became prominent celebrities, whose studios were frequented by kings, whose society was sought out by nobles and men of fashion, whose trivial life was thought the most interesting source of anecdote.

It is, I think, also characteristic of the age, that painting should come into such prominence, in comparison with the sister arts. In older days the dramatic poet, the sculptor, the architect, were the leading representatives of art, perhaps the sculptor less so than the others. But now we hear a great deal about painters, their early struggles to obtain recognition, their enormous profits when they succeeded, and the consequent ostentation of their lives. The fashion had now long prevailed (above, p. 108) of painting on panels (πίνακες). This kind of art could command prices from many a rich patron ; whereas statues, whether of bronze or marble, were difficult to move, and were, moreover, too calm and monumental for the taste of a society which loved great passions and exciting moments. Such a subject as the Laocoon could be better portrayed in a picture, with colours and accessory circumstances, than in marble, even with the consummate mastery of their art which the Rhodian sculptors attained. And so the reader may read in Overbeck's interesting collection¹ of the ancient notices of the fashionable painters, how they sought out all manner of technical devices to reproduce not only the stormiest affections of the mind, but the bloody foam upon the champing bit, the momentary blush upon the dark cheek. Portraits also came into fashion, not only of actual men, such as that of Alexander the Great at the temple of Ephesus, which Apelles painted for twenty talents (about £4800), and Antigonos (already described, p. 109), but fancy portraits of imaginary or long past men.

¹ The treaty of Philip V. and Hannibal shows this lavish enumeration of gods, who are invoked to sanction the obligations undertaken by two men who probably believed in none of them.

This Apelles, who is the real father of Hellenistic painting, painted a portrait of himself, a fact which implies the use of good mirrors, without which the feat would be hardly possible. It was he, too, who invented a peculiar varnish, which not only protected the picture but toned down the colour ; and other devices he expounded in a special treatise on his art.¹ I have mentioned Apelles's visit to the Ialysos of his younger rival, Protogenes (cf. above, p. 108). After a great pause, he said the labour was great and the result wonderful, but that it did not possess the grace by which his own paintings reached the skies. This Protogenes also painted a satyr with a quail sitting on a pillar beside him, which was so life-like that the public brought real quails, which tried to attack it, and in the end Protogenes obtained leave of the custodians of the temple, for whom he had painted it, to wipe out the quail as it interfered with the appreciation of the principal figure.

¹ Die antike Schriftquellen zur Gesch. der bildenden Künste bei den Griechen (Leipzig, 1868).

These stories disclose to us a state of things like that of the Renaissance, when the priests of a church would employ an artist to paint them an altar-piece, or perhaps a rich patron would pay for such an ornament.

The demand for novelty even sent men of genius to study the vulgarities and trivialities of low life, and we have the Hellenistic 'Teniers school,' ryparographi, dirt-painters, as they were called, depicting barbers', tailors', and cobblers' shops, loaded asses with their vegetables for market, and the like.² We even come so far as to have the unfinished work of a master specially prized, because it was unfinished—a judgment we find in Pliny,³ but no doubt echoed from Hellenistic days. The climax of this meretricious taste for vulgar detail was the work of Sosos of Pergamum, who represented in mosaic an unswept floor, with all the scraps and remains of a banquet lying about, such as might be seen before the room was cleaned out. With these unhealthy symptoms came in the taste for gems, intaglios, embroidery, and fine pottery, all of which commanded high prices, and if this taste did not ennoble art it at least gave a great stimulus to trade.

¹ Overbeck's S. Q. Nos. 1893, 1900.

² S. Q. No. 1963.

³ S. Q. No. 2122.

As I have been insisting upon so many points of similarity with modern times, I will conclude this chapter with a citation from Polybius, which still shows the antique Greek spirit surviving as regards an important feature in education. We should expect that the more art fell into the hands of professionals, and it was distinctly perceived that the most perfect performer might be a villain, the more the theory of the moral influence of art would be abandoned, or lost out of sight. Such, for example, is the case nowadays. Nobody thinks of playing Beethoven or Wagner with a view to the moral improvement of the hearer. But this had been the universal belief down to Aristotle, and is insisted upon in his Politics, a book less visionary perhaps, and tamer in its views, than most modern works on political theories. Still Aristotle represents Hellenedom, not Hellenism, and is therefore no witness for the age after the revolution produced by Alexander. But Polybius, the sceptic, the modern man, the philo-Roman, the real Machiavelli of pre-Christian times, what does he say on the same subject?

Since therefore the Arcadian people have a very high standing among the Greeks, not only by reason of the hospitality and kindness of their manners, but still more for their piety to the Deity, it is worth while pausing to discuss the savageness of the Cynæthans, and how they, being confessedly Arcadians, were notorious above the rest of the Greeks at this time for cruelty and lawlessness. The reason seems to me this, that they first and alone of the Arcadians abandoned what the ancients had carefully devised and planned according to nature as applying to all the inhabitants of Arcadia. For the practice of music, at least music in the true sense, is to all a benefit, but to Arcadians a positive necessity. We must not consider music, as Ephorus said in the Preface to practice of it compulsory not only to men up to thirty years of age, though in other are very severe. This is well known and that perhaps only among the Arcadians, but their earliest youth according to law the festival in which each town celebrates its local and tutelary gods; after this learning the strains of Timotheus, their highest ambition is to surpass flute-players in the theatres, boys in the theatre in those of grown men. So also all their entertainments they prefer to provide among themselves than to bring in professional and they arrange that the company shall consider too that to confess ignorance or is not a disgrace, but a knowledge of singing seeing that they are all compelled to learn decline to sing under these circumstances, a breach of manners. Moreover the youths of their own citizens in the theatres martial have practised in military array, and organise under common control by subscription seem to me to have introduced these customs of luxury, but considering that they were farmers, and generally the laborious and hard life. They considered also the strictness of law follows naturally from the cold and harsh exhausted their ingenuity in striving to refine and humanise the ruggedness of the natural man by a careful training. This it was that the Cynæthans completely neglected when they too most required such assistance, as they inhabited a climate and country far the harshest in Arcadia, and so, falling into mutual disputes and jealousies, at last became so inhuman that in no Hellenic city anywhere did there occur greater or more frequent atrocities.¹

Let me add that Cynætha was situated in the wild alps now known as the Chelmos range, which separate Arcadia from Achæa, where even now, when the climate is milder than of old, snow remains in many places till April or May, and that the whole of Arcadia was then the home of bears and wolves in the great forests which still leave some remains in our day. The change from this real conception of Arcadia to the pastoral and romantic conception now suggested by the word was first traced out and explained in the twelfth chapter of my Rambles and Studies in Greece.

Thus—in the midst of rampant scepticism, in the midst of myriad disillusion, in spite of the decay of Hellenistic glory and the rise of Roman greatness—we still have the old theory of the morality of music firmly upheld by the most advanced and unromantic thinker of the day. Does not this suggest to us strongly that we now may be overlooking subtle laws of moral progress, subtle influences permeating all our life? Is it really certain that the ear cannot learn vice or virtue through the suggestion of melody, and that moral prejudices may not be the outcome of æsthetical training?

¹ Polyb. iv. 20, 21.

CHAPTER .

THE CRISIS OF III

POLYBIUS insists again and again in the world's fortunes from which history. He says that about the the great thrones of the world of was more, passed into the hands age. 'The new Ptolemy, aged, perhaps the oldest, but certainly the most The others, Antiochus III., Philip was Hannibal, who succeeded to it with such momentous consequences were the only established men of world. Achæus indeed, the uncle of himself a kingdom in Asia Minor, able man But he was a younger forth the history of the Mediterranean nations follows no separate channels, but runs in one broad stream.

It is very interesting to note the characters of the boys who had such vast interests thrown into their hands; nor can we say that their youth and inexperience were the direct causes of their subjugation by Rome. For the gigantic struggle of the second Punic war occupied the great republic for nearly twenty years, during which all these sovereigns had ample time to gain experience; they had not been shaken on their thrones, and had been engaged in struggles sufficient to develop any talents they possessed. But it was an age strangely lacking in genius. One colossal figure towers above all—the Barcide Hannibal; the rest are mediocre or below mediocrity. Ptolemy Philopator, as I have said, was the most insignificant. We note first in him the curious and rapid change of the great family of the Lagidæ into debauchees, dilettanti, drunkards, dolts. We saw even in the great Euergetes a decay in power and activity while he was yet in middle age. His son was a feeble and colourless person, in the hands of a clever old diplomatist, and was not even stimulated by his brilliant victory at Raphia to wake up from his sloth and his sensual pleasures. He is now further known as a persecutor of Egyptians and their religion, and as having therefore brought Egypt into a state of revolt, which was with difficulty remedied by Ptolemy Epiphanes. So the third book of Maccabees makes him quite correctly, though perhaps only poetically, a persecutor, but of the Jews. This will be discussed again in relation to the national reaction of the Jews against Antiochus Epiphanes.

The first glimpse we get of his court is in the conclusion of Plutarch's Life of Cleomenes, when the exiled hero, having lost his kingdom by the battle of Sellasia, came to

...where he might either pe again the struggle for Greece, or
We are told that he greatly imp have been sent back with a fleet died, and his son Philopator su devoted to drinking and revelry :
relatives of the king's mistress bec country; nor had Cleomenes a cha for his projects. Still he was consu especially on the proposed murc brother, who was a favourite with the menes protested against the crime unfortunately added that as far as t cerned, 3000 of them were Pelope his bidding at any moment, if h
This alarmed the king's advisers, cage the lion. It may be that P from whom Plutarch copies the ti heightened the real contrast betwe in his hardly disguised prison, and t enslaved by lusts and minions. Wl before rejected the advice to comm that he must not abandon his co

even this amount of sympathy. When the attempt on the prison failed, and nothing was left to the Spartan but honourable suicide, the wretched Egyptian king could add no vengeance but to hang up his body in a sack, and to have his mother, wife, and children executed. The picture of the Spartan exile walking on the pier at Alexandria, and looking out for news from home, the irony with which the first man he meets from Greece turns out to be a horse-dealer and an impatient creditor, who reports to the court his jibe that the king wants minions and flute-girls, not war-horses—all this forms one of the most attractive pages in Plutarch.

Yet the monarchy was so well established that this debauchee king not only lived out his life in possession of the throne, but fought a successful war against an energetic rival, and left his kingdom to his infant heir, even though his life was curtailed by his vices and his empire by revolt. I will return to the third Syrian war, as it is called, when I come to consider the diplomacy of this period. The home policy of Sosibius, the wily prime minister of the king, consisted in 'removing' all persons of importance near the throne, among others, the king's uncle Lysimachus, his brother Magas, his sister and wife Berenice, and the Spartan Cleomenes. Thus we see Egypt degenerating into a mere vulgar oriental despotism. Let us turn to Syria.

Here Achæus was left in command by the sudden death of Seleucus III. (Soter), but at first he was loyal enough to hand over the crown (which the king's son, an infant, only assumed for a moment) to the late king's younger brother, Antiochus III., a youth of nineteen, who found the empire in anything but order. Confirming Achæus in the command of Asia Minor, he made his first campaigns against the

and the forts taken by Euergetes, es Orontes, the port of Antioch. And great struggle among various officers should rule him.² Indeed he only go vizier Hermeias, who desired to play Syria, by stratagem. The plot was u favourite physician, Apollophanes, v address the king, and tell him not to suspicion about the ambition of Her he fell into the same snare as his b this crisis was not far off, so he besc self and save both himself and hi Antiochus confessed his dislike at and his sincere thanks to Apolloph out about the matter, the latter took that he had not been astray as to th king urged him to take up the ques in words but in act. When Apollop their plot, and making the excuse tha from dizziness, they dismissed the ho usually mounted guard for some days to communicate with such of their fri the plea of their calling to inquire for they matured their plan. The physicians prescribed a walk for Antiochus in the cool of the dawn, and Hermeias came with those who knew about it at the appointed time, but most of them were late on account of the king going out at a perfectly unheard-of hour. So they drew Hermeias out into a quiet place away from the camp, and then, while the king turned aside for a moment, stabbed him. So Hermeias died, paying no penalty adequate to his misdeeds.' At the publication of the news the women of Apamea stoned the wife of Hermeias to death, and the children of Apamea his sons.¹

What is to be noted at the court of this king is that the great majority of officers are Greeks, indeed the army seems almost entirely commanded by Ætolians, Cretans, Achæans, with an occasional Galatian chief. Even the armies of Molon and Alexander, which the king overthrew in a personal campaign by his prestige rather than his arms, were partly Greek and partly Galatian. And yet the manners and customs seem barbarised, and by no means like those of Hellenic belligerents. Polybius even remarks, as I have just cited, that Hermeias, when he was stabbed to death, suffered no adequate retribution for his crimes, by which he means that he escaped torture. So Molon and Alexander put their families and themselves to death as soon as they were defeated, knowing what tortures awaited them, and their bodies were set up on gibbets by the king's orders. So again, in the remarkable narrative of the betrayal and capture of Achæus,² when trying to escape from the citadel of Sardis, where Antiochus had him closely invested; when the young king, sitting up alone in the night in the greatest excitement, at last sees his great enemy thrown bound upon the floor before him, and bursts into tears after long silence, we expect to hear of a reconciliation or pardon ; but nothing of the sort. The peers assembled at break of day discuss what kind of revenge is to be wreaked upon him, and they resolved first to mutilate him by cutting off his limbs, and then to sew him up in a sack of ass-skin, and gibbet the body. There seems to be some oriental notion of uncleanness suggested by the ass-skin.

¹ Polyb. v. 56.

² Cf. below p. 414.

If we should infer from these details that Antiochus III. was cruel in disposition we should err greatly. In his subsequent wars in the East he showed considerable generosity to vanquished foes, and in several cases replaced them in their dominions. The one crime, which is to be expiated by every torture, is treason, revolt against the lawful sovereign, in this again showing a spirit akin to that of the Middle Ages, when the same crime was treated as far the most heinous known to the law.

While we hear a great deal from Polybius about the early campaigns of Antiochus, whose reconquest of his kingdom, whose great campaign in his north-east provinces,¹ and whose personal prowess and general activity justify thoroughly his epithet of Antiochus the Great, we cannot obtain any very clear notion of the man as distinct from other active rulers. In his youth he shows considerable vacillation in his policy, owing to the conflicting opinions of his advisers, and yet when he once takes a thing in hand he does it well. But to most readers he is only known as the luxurious, feeble, ambitious man of fifty, who attacked the Romans in Greece, and then lost his power by a single battle (Magnesia, 190 B.C.). His epithet of Great is inexplicable without some knowledge of his early history.

The portrait of Philip V. is far more distinct. Educated

¹ Cf. the summary of his Eastern campaigns in Polyb. xi. 34.

with care for the throne by the wise and able Antigonus Doson, he possessed, according to Polybius, the necessary qualities for a sovrän in a high degree. It is very interesting to see what these qualities are, and in what order Polybius enumerates them. 'It is not easy to find,' says he (iv. 77), 'a king endowed with more natural advantages for the control of affairs. For he had both smartness and a good memory, and exceptional grace of manner—so far one might imagine the historian describing the Prince of Wales—and besides, a royal presence and dignity, but what is most important of all, resource and daring in war. And what it was that overcame all these advantages and turned a king by nature into a brutal tyrant, is not easy to explain in a few words.' Plutarch, on the other hand,¹ reverses the matter: 'When through the favours of fortune he was puffed up, and nurtured within him many strong desires, his inborn badness overcoming his artificial pretences, and emerging by degrees, exposed his real character, so that he seduced the younger Aratus's wife while staying in his house as a guest,' etc. He repeats² this view, and says 'that Philip appears to have undergone the most unexpected change, becoming a vicious man and destructive tyrant, from being a gentle king and a modest youth. This, however, was no real change of nature, but the disclosure in the time of his security of that wickedness which had long been hidden during his fears.' Polybius, too, comes back to his point (x. 26), and says that he was really good at first, but that his vices developed with increasing age, as is the case with some horses.

This curious declension in the Antigonid house is not a little remarkable. Since Demetrius the Besieger there had been nothing but serious and able men in that family, with the one exception of Demetrius the Fair, who had lost his life by his love intrigues. But here is a young man brought up in the traditions of this greatness, who believed in it all, and turns his abilities and his charms to the worst purposes. In two respects, however, his early life contrasted strongly with those of his predecessors. In the first place, while they, like Antiochus the Great, began their reigns by reconquering all their kingdom, and displaying great military activity in these dangers, Philip came to the throne the darling of all Greece. Everybody was his friend. Even the wild and warring Cretan cities agreed voluntarily to submit to his authority. He escaped, therefore, the stern lessons of adversity, which had hardened and exercised the youth of earlier Macedonian kings. Secondly, Antigonus Doson, his guardian, who was evidently a practical man, and no theorist, seems to have entrusted his education not to philosophers but to politicians, or rather diplomatists whose deceitful and tortuous ways were anything but wholesome for a prince.

¹ Aratus, 49.

² Aratus, c. 51, sub fin.

Among these the most remarkable was Aratus, whose character we know, and whose rage against tyrants and tyranny was tempered with much obsequiousness to hereditary princes. No doubt he was a most competent instructor in the intricacies of Peloponnesian politics, but what high principle, what noble sentiment, what real dignity, could be learned from that wily old diplomatist? Even in war his motto was the exact reverse of Alexander's famous οὐ κλέπτω τὴν νίκην. Moreover the officers to whom Doson, who felt his health breaking down, left the charge of affairs seem to have been badly chosen, and to have rather set on the young king to vice than kept him in the path of virtue. Above all, these people had no ideas, like the Borysthenite fanatic who inspired Cleomenes, and I can see in this age a sort of discrediting of the higher teaching, which had maintained the spirit and the morals of earlier generations. The great philosophers, as I have noted, were gone. Their successors, more numerous, more diffused through the world, were perhaps no longer thought great enough to be instructors of kings. In any case, the theory of divine right was fatal in its consequences; for why educate in moral principles a personage whose every caprice must be just?

The one science which seemed worth studying in that day was diplomacy, and diplomacy understood as the science of deceiving men who had already been deceived, and who ought therefore to be proof against ordinary wiles. It is a frequent remark of Polybius, when recounting the surprises and treacheries which were now constantly taking place, that man, who is supposed the most intelligent of all animals, is really the silliest and most gullible, for that no amount of experience in deceit will prevent him from trusting afresh the very people whom he has seen profiting by treachery.¹ There are seasons in the world's history when this sort of systematised deceit becomes the highest fashion, and when to be a statesman merely means to succeed in practising it. The appeal to the great sound instincts of man never disappears; the eternal homage which vice pays to virtue cannot be shaken off, nay, it is one of the noblest signs of the indestructibility of our moral nature that every villain not only praises it and affects it, but trades upon it.

¹ Polyb. v. 75. — 'It seems to me that man is the most easily deceived of all animals, though he is reckoned the most sagacious. For how many camps and forts, how many and how great cities have not been taken by treachery? And though this has happened so continually and so publicly to so many, I know not how it is that we are by nature ever new and young as regards these deceits.' He attributes this to a want of intelligent study of past history.

Nevertheless there are days when great ideas flourish, and others when they seem to lose their hold on the world. The epoch upon which we are now entering is one of the latter. With Antigonos Doson and Cleomenes the great age of Hellenism is gone.

Can we see any reasons for this decay of principle and rise of the reign of mere expediency? I think we can, even if they be not thought sufficient to account for the whole change. The spread of Hellenism over the large area of Alexander's empire was distinctly the spread of cosmopolitanism, of the Greek language, and of a common standard of manners. All the new capitals and courts aimed at the same sort of etiquette, the same kind of elegance, the same splendour. They all affected the same taste for the arts and luxuries of life. So likewise the people that lived in these and other Hellenistic cities were moulded on the same type, and though it might happen in outlying Parthian cities that in a crisis the orientals would rise and murder all the Greek inhabitants,¹ and though in Egypt or Judæa the severance was still clear, in most of these cities the races were fused, and all real sense of nationality gone.

So it was with the armies. Whether it be Hiero fighting in Sicily or Antiochus in Bactria, the soldiers were Arcadians, Ætolians, Cretans, Galatians, under the command of Rhodians, Achæans, Athenians, Spartans. Even the ancient and conservative Spartans, and the hardly less conservative Achæans fought their wars with mercenaries, and armed their men as a Macedonian phalanx. There were such things as citizen militias, and Philopœmen presently made his fame by reviving one for the Achæan League. But elsewhere war was a matter of money, and all the armies fought for pay and not for patriotism. Indeed the philosophers had long preached against this virtue as mere narrowness of mind, leading to much discomfort, and had insisted that exile was no real punishment. But however patriotism may be superseded in stray individuals by larger benevolence, bodies of men who abandon it will only replace it by meaner motives.

¹ Polyb. x. 31.

Hence the decay of patriotism, produced both by the spread of Hellenism and by the doctrines of the philosophers, brought with it the decay of high feeling, of sentiment in politics, of sacrifice for an idea, and left in their place the mere computation of sordid interest. Thus the field of diplomacy became terribly enlarged. Before every siege or battle the first thing was to tempt the opposite side with bribes, to offer the mercenary leaders higher pay. This was the most effectual strategy. Aratus knew, says Polybius, when he made overtures to his old enemy Antigonos, 'that the friendships of kings are purely determined by their interests, and that such a thing as fast friendship or undying hate was not to be expected.' In the midst of the most vigorous campaigns or sieges there were always communications going on between the belligerents. There were also, as I already explained in the case of Rhodes, mediating powers ever ready to tender their good offices, and diplomatic parleying was perpetually interchanging with raids and battles. I will give as specimens of this kind of war two curious narratives, in all their detail, from Polybius, by which the reader will see more clearly than by general statements the spirit of the age portrayed in its leading events. Polybius, though a poor writer, is always most instructive, and sometimes even picturesque, when his subject leads him to give a connected narrative of some great adventure. The story of the capture of Achæus is perhaps the most striking of these episodes.¹ But I begin with the transactions which preceded the Syrian war between Antiochus the Great and Ptolemy Philopator.²

The character of Ptolemy was so feeble, and his neglect of all military preparations had been so great, that the idea of protecting his rights with the sword, which was his most obvious duty, never occurred to him.

Agathocles and Sosibius, however, his leading ministers at that time, took counsel together and did the best they could with the means at their disposal, in view of the existing crisis. They resolved to devote themselves to the preparations for war; and meanwhile, by embassies to try to retard the advance of Antiochus, pretending to confirm him in the opinion he originally entertained about Ptolemy, namely, that the latter would not venture to fight, but would trust to negotiations and the interposition of common friends to induce Antiochus to evacuate Cœle-Syria. Having determined upon this policy Agathocles and Sosibius, to whom the whole business was entrusted, lost no time in sending their embassies to Antiochus: and at the same time they sent messages to Rhodes, Byzantium, and Cyzicus, not omitting the Ætolians, inviting them to send commissioners to discuss the terms of a settlement. The commissioners duly arrived, and by occupying the time with going backwards and forwards between the two kings, abundantly secured to these statesmen what they wanted,—delay, and time to make their preparations for war. They fixed their residence at Memphis, and there carried on these negotiations continuously. Nor were they less attentive to the ambassadors from Antiochus, whom they received with every mark of courtesy and kindness. But meanwhile they were calling up and collecting at Alexandria the mercenaries whom they had on service in towns outside Egypt; were despatching men to recruit foreign soldiers; and were collecting provisions both for the troops they already possessed and for those that were coming in. No less active were they in every other department of military preparation. They took turns in going on rapid and frequent visits to Alexandria, to see that the supplies should in no point be inadequate to the undertaking before them. The manufacture of arms, the selection of men, and their division into companies, they committed to the care of Echeocrates of Thessaly and Phoxidas of Melita. With these they associated Eurylochus of Magnesia and Socrates of Bœotia, who were also joined by Cnopias of Allaria. By the greatest good fortune they had got hold of these officers, who, while serving with Demetrius (II. of Macedon) and Antigonus (Doson), had acquired some experience of real war and actual service in the field. Accordingly when these took command of the Egyptian population, they made the best of them by giving them the training of soldiers.

¹ In saying this I do not forget the brilliant story of the capture of Tarentum by Hannibal (viii. 26-36), perhaps the best of all his narratives. But on the Italian side of Polybius I must refer the reader to Mr. Strachan Davidson's forthcoming Selections. ² Polyb. v. 63, sq.

Their first measure was to divide them according to their country and age, and to assign to each division its appropriate arms, taking no account of what they had borne before. Next they broke up their battalions and muster-rolls, which had been formed on the basis of their old system of pay, and formed them into companies adapted to the immediate purpose. Having effected this they began to drill the men; habituating them severally not only to obey the words of command, but also to the proper management of their weapons.¹ They also frequently summoned general meetings at headquarters, and delivered speeches to the men. The most useful in this respect were Andromachus of Aspendus and Polycrates of Argos; because they had recently crossed from Greece, and were still thoroughly imbued with the Greek spirit, and the military ideas prevalent in the several states. Moreover, they were illustrious on the score of their private wealth, as well as on that of their respective countries; to which advantages Polycrates added those of an ancient family and of the reputation obtained by his father Mnasiadas as an athlete. By private and public exhortations these officers inspired their men with a zeal and enthusiasm for the struggle which awaited them. All these officers, too, had commands in the army suited to their particular accomplishments. Eurylochus of Magnesia commanded about three thousand men of what was called in the royal armies the Agema, or Guard ; Socrates of Bœotia had two thousand light-armed troops under him ; while the Achæan Phoxidas, and Ptolemy the son of Thrasesas, and Andromachus of Aspendus were associated in the duty of drilling the phalanx [of Egyptians] and the mercenary Greek soldiers on the same ground,—Andromachus and Ptolemy commanding the phalanx, Phoxidas the mercenaries, of which the numbers were respectively twenty-five thousand and eight thousand. The cavalry, again, attached to the court, amounting to seven hundred, as well as that which was obtained from Libya or enlisted from the native Egyptians, were being trained by Polycrates, and were under his personal command, amounting in all to about three thousand men. In the actual campaign the most effective service was performed by the Greek cavalry, which with the whole body of mercenary cavalry, amounting to two thousand men, was splendidly trained by Echeocrates of Thessaly. No one took more pains with the men under his command than Cnopias of Allaria. He commanded all the Cretans, who numbered three thousand, and among them a thousand Neo-Cretans over whom he had set Philo of Cnossus. They also armed three thousand Libyans in the Macedonian fashion, who were commanded by Ammonius of Barce. The Egyptians themselves supplied twenty thousand soldiers to the phalanx, and were under the command of Sosibius. A body of Thracians and Gauls was also enrolled, four thousand being taken from mercenaries settled in the country and their descendants, while two thousand had been recently enlisted and brought over ; and these were under the command of Dionysius of Thrace. Such in its numbers, and in the variety of the elements of which it was composed, was the force which was being got ready for Ptolemy.

¹ Though it is not very clear in Polybius's narrative, I am convinced that this paragraph refers mainly to the training of the native Egyptians, whose old military caste had been long neglected and disused, though it possibly still existed in name. In v. 107 Polybius specially notices the effect of the present policy upon the Egyptians.

Meanwhile Antiochus had been engaged in the siege of Doura : but the strength of the place and the support given it by Nicolaus prevented him from effecting anything ; and as the winter was closing in, he agreed with the ambassadors of Ptolemy to a suspension of hostilities for four months, and promised that he would discuss the whole question at issue in a friendly spirit. But he was as far as possible from being sincere in this negotiation : his real object was to avoid being detained any length of time from his own country, and to be able to place his troops in winter quarters at Seleucia, because Achæus was now notoriously plotting against him, and without disguise co-operating with Ptolemy. So, having come to this agreement, Antiochus dismissed the ambassadors with injunctions to acquaint him as soon as possible with the decision of Ptolemy, and to meet him at Seleucia. He then placed the necessary guards in the various strongholds, committed to Theodotus the command-in-chief over them all, and returned home. On his arrival at Seleucia he distributed his forces into their winter quarters ; and from that time forth he took no pains to keep the mass of his army under discipline, being persuaded that the business would not call for any more fighting ; because he was already master of some portions of Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia, and expected to secure the rest by voluntary submission or by diplomacy : for Ptolemy, he believed, would not venture upon a general engagement. This opinion was shared also by the ambassadors, because Sosibius fixing his residence at Memphis conducted his negotiations with them in a friendly manner, while he prevented those who went backwards and forwards to Antiochus from ever becoming eye-witnesses of the preparations that were being carried on at Alexandria.¹ Nay even by the time that the ambassadors arrived, Sosibius was already prepared for every eventuality.

Meanwhile Antiochus was extremely anxious to have as much the advantage over the government of Alexandria in diplomatic argument as he had in arms. Accordingly when the ambassadors arrived at Seleucia, and both parties began, in accordance with the instructions of Sosibius, to discuss the clauses of the proposed arrangement in detail, the king made very light of the loss recently sustained by Ptolemy, and the injury which had been manifestly inflicted upon him by the existing occupation of Cœle-Syria ; and in the pleadings on this subject he refused to look upon this transaction in the light of an injury at all, alleging that certain things belonged to him of right. He asserted that the original occupation of the country by (the first) Antigonos, and the royal authority exercised over it by (the first) Seleucus, constituted an absolutely decisive and equitable claim, in virtue of which Cœle-Syria belonged of right to himself and not to Ptolemy ; for Ptolemy I. went to war with Antigonos with the view of annexing this country not to his own government but to that of Seleucus. But, above all, he pressed the convention entered into by the three kings, Casander, Lysimachus, and Seleucus, when, after having conquered Antigonos, they deliberated in common upon the arrangements to be made, and decided that the whole of Syria should belong to Seleucus.

¹ The reader will remember that as Memphis was close to the present Cairo, Syrian ambassadors would ascend the eastern (Pelusiac) mouth of the Nile, which is some 80 miles from the western (Canopic), where Alexandria is situated. Thus they could be kept quite clear of all contact with that arsenal and camp.

The commissioners of Ptolemy endeavoured to establish the opposite case. They magnified the existing injury and dilated on its hardship, asserting that the treason of Theodotus and the invasion of Antiochus amounted to a breach of treaty-rights. They alleged the possession of these places in the reign of Ptolemy I., son of Lagus, and tried to show that Ptolemy had joined Seleucus in the war on the understanding that he was to invest Seleucus with the government of the whole of Asia, but was to take Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia for himself.

Such were the arguments brought forward by the two contracting parties in the course of the embassies and counter-embassies and conferences. There was no prospect, however, of arriving at any result, because the controversy was conducted, not by the principals, but by the common friends of both ; and there was no one to intervene authoritatively to check and control the caprice of the party which they might decide to be in the wrong. But what caused the most insuperable difficulty was the matter of Achæus. For Ptolemy was eager that the terms of the treaty should include him ; while Antiochus would not allow the subject to be so much as mentioned, and was indignant that Ptolemy should venture to protect rebels, or bring such a point into the discussion at all.

The approach of spring found both sides weary of negotiations, and with no prospect of coming to a conclusion. Antiochus therefore began collecting his forces with a view of making an invasion by land and sea, and completing his conquest of Cœle-Syria.

Here is the second passage :—¹

Bolis was by birth a Cretan, who had long enjoyed the honours of high military rank at the Egyptian court, and the reputation of being second to none in natural ability, adventurous daring, and experience in war. By repeated arguments Sosibius tested this man's fidelity; and when he felt sure of his zeal and affection he communicated the business in hand to him. He told him that he could not do the king a more acceptable service at the present crisis, than by contriving some way of saving Achæus [who was now closely besieged in the citadel of Sardis]. At the moment Bolis listened, and retired without saying more than that he would consider the suggestion. But after two or three days' reflection, he came to Sosibius and said that he would undertake the business; remarking that having spent some considerable time at Sardis he knew its topography, and that Cambylus, the commander of the Cretan contingent of the army of Antiochus, was not only a fellow-citizen of his, but a kinsman and friend to boot. It chanced moreover that Cambylus and his men had in charge one of the outposts on the rear of the acropolis, where the nature of the ground did not admit of siege works, but the place was guarded by a permanent cantonment of troops under Cambylus. Sosibius caught at the suggestion, convinced that if Achæus could be saved at all from his dangerous situation it could be better accomplished by the agency of Bolis than any one else; and this conviction being backed by readiness on the part of Bolis, the undertaking soon began to mature. Sosibius at once supplied the money necessary for the attempt, and promised a large sum besides in case of its success; at the same time raising the hopes of Bolis to the utmost by dilating upon the favours he might expect from the king, as well as from the rescued prince himself.

Full of eagerness, therefore, for success, Bolis set sail without delay, taking with him a letter in cipher and other credentials addressed to Nicomachus at Rhodes, who was believed to entertain a fatherly affection and devotion for Achæus, and also to Melancomas at Ephesus; for these were the men formerly employed by Achæus in his negotiations with Ptolemy and in all other foreign affairs.

¹ viii. 17, sq.

Bolis went to Rhodes, and thence to Ephesus; communicated his purpose to Nicomachus and Melancomas, and found them ready to do what they were asked. He then despatched one of his staff, named Arianus, to Cambylus with a message to the effect that he had been sent from Alexandria on a recruiting tour, and that he wished for an interview with Cambylus on some matters of importance; he thought it therefore necessary to have a time and place arranged for them to meet, without the privity of a third person. Arianus quickly obtained an interview with Cambylus and delivered his message, nor was the latter at all unwilling to listen to the proposal. Having appointed a day, and a place known to both himself and Bolis, at which he would be after nightfall, he dismissed Arianus.

Now Bolis had all the subtlety of a Cretan, and he accordingly weighed carefully in his own mind every possible line of action, and patiently examined every idea which presented itself to him. Finally he met Cambylus, according to the arrangement made with Arianus, and delivered his letter. This was now made the subject of a truly Cretical discussion between them. They never took into consideration the means of saving the person in danger, or their obligations of honour to those who had entrusted them with the undertaking, but confined their discussion entirely to the question of their own safety and their own advantage. As they were both Cretans they were not long in coming to an agreement, which was, first of all, to divide the ten talents supplied by Sosibius between themselves in equal shares, and, secondly, to discover the whole affair to Antiochus, and to offer with his support to put Achæus into his hands, on condition of receiving a sum of money, and promises for the future, on a scale commensurate with the greatness of the undertaking. Having settled upon this plan of action, Cambylus undertook the negotiation with Antiochus, while to Bolis was assigned the duty of sending Arianus within the next few days to Achæus, bearing letters in cipher from Nicomachus and Melancomas; he bade Cambylus however take upon himself to consider how Arianus was to make his way into the acropolis and return with safety. 'If' said Bolis, 'Achæus consents to make the attempt, and sends an answer to Nicomachus and Melancomas, I will be ready to act and will communicate with you.' Having thus arranged the part which each was to take in the plot, they separated, and set about their several tasks.

At the first opportunity Cambylus laid the proposal before the king. It was as acceptable to Antiochus as it was unexpected : in the first flush of his exultation he promised everything they asked ; but presently feeling some distrust, he questioned Cambylus on every detail of their plan, and their means of carrying it out. Being eventually satisfied on these points, and believing that the undertaking was under the special favour of Providence, he repeatedly begged and prayed Cambylus to bring it to a conclusion. Bolis was equally successful with Nicomachus and Melancomas. They entertained no doubt of his sincerity, and joined him in the composition of letters to Achæus,—composed in a cipher which they had been accustomed to use,—exhorting him to trust Bolis and Cambylus. So Arianus, having by the aid of Cambylus made his way into the acropolis, delivered the letters to Achæus ; and having had personal acquaintance with the whole business from its commencement, he was able to give an account of every detail when questioned and cross-questioned again and again by Achæus about Sosibius and Bolis, about Nicomachus and Melancomas, and most particularly about the part which Cambylus was taking in the affair. He could of course stand this cross-examination with sincerity and candour, because in point of fact he was not acquainted with the most important part of the plan which Cambylus and Bolis had adopted. Achæus was convinced by the answers of Arianus, and still more by the cipher of Nicomachus and Melancomas ; wrote his answer ; and sent Arianus back with it without delay. This kind of communication was repeated more than once, and at last Achæus entrusted himself without reserve to Nicomachus, there being absolutely no other hope of saving himself, and bade him send Bolis with Arianus on a certain moonless night, promising to place himself in their hands. The idea of Achæus was first of all to escape his immediate danger, and then by a circuitous route to make his way into Syria. For he entertained very great hopes that if he appeared suddenly and unexpectedly to the Syrians, while Antiochus was still lingering about Sardis, he would be able to stir up a great movement, and meet with a cordial reception from the people of Antioch, Cœle-Syria, and Phœnicia.

With such expectations and calculations Achæus awaited the appearance of Bolis.

Meanwhile Arianus had reached Melancomas, who, on reading the letter which he brought, immediately despatched Bolis with many words of exhortation and great promises of profit if he succeeded in his enterprise. Bolis sent Arianus in advance to signify his arrival to Cambylus, and went after nightfall to their usual place of meeting. There they spent a whole day together settling every detail of their plan of operations ; and having done this they went into the camp under cover of night. The arrangement made between them was this. If it turned out that Achæus came from the acropolis alone with Bolis and Arianus, or with only one attendant, he would give them no cause for anxiety at all, but would be easily captured by the ambuscade set for him. If, on the other hand, he should be accompanied by a considerable number, the business would be one of some difficulty to those entrusted with it, especially as they were anxious to capture him alive, because it would most gratify Antiochus. In that case, therefore, Arianus, while conducting Achæus, must go in front, because he knew the path by which he had on several occasions effected his entrance and return ; Bolis was to bring up the rear, in order that, when they arrived at the spot where Cambylus was to have his ambuscade ready, he might lay hold on Achæus, and prevent his getting away through wooded ground, in the confusion and darkness of the night, or throwing himself in despair from some precipice : thus they would secure that he fell as they intended into his enemies' hands alive.

These arrangements having been agreed upon, Bolis was taken by Cambylus on the very night of his arrival, without any one else, and introduced to Antiochus. The king was alone and received them graciously ; he pledged himself to the performance of his promises, and urged them both again and again not to postpone any longer the performance of their purpose. Thereupon they returned for the present to their own camp : but towards morning Bolis accompanied by Arianus ascended the acropolis, and entered it before daybreak.

Achæus received them with warmth and cordiality, and questioned Bolis at great length on every detail. From the expression of his face and his conversation he judged Bolis to be a man of a character weighty enough for so serious an undertaking; but while he exulted in the prospect of his release, he likewise grew painfully excited, and was torn with an agony of anxiety, at the gravity of the issues at stake. But no one had a clearer head or greater experience in affairs than he; and accordingly he determined that his safety should not depend entirely on the good faith of Bolis. He accordingly told him that it was impossible for him to leave the acropolis at the moment, but that he would send some two or three of his friends with him, and by the time that they had joined Melancomas he would be prepared to depart. Thus Achæus did all he could for his security; but he did not know that he was trying to do what the proverb declares to be impossible—outwit a Cretan. For there was no trick likely to be tried that Bolis had not anticipated. However when the night came, in which Achæus said that he would send his friends with them, he sent on Arianus and Bolis to the entrance of the acropolis, with instructions to wait there until those who were to go with them arrived. They did as he bade them. Achæus then at the very moment of his departure communicated his plan to his wife Laodice, and she was so terrified at his sudden resolve that he had to spend some time in entreating her to be calm, in soothing her feelings, and encouraging her by pointing out the hopes which he entertained. This done he started with four companions, whom he dressed in ordinary clothes, while he himself put on a mean and common dress and disguised his rank as much as possible. He selected one of his four companions to be always prepared to answer anything said by Arianus, and to ask any necessary question of him, and bade him say that the other four did not speak Greek.

The five then joined Arianus and they all started together on their journey. Arianus went in front as being acquainted with the way, while Bolis took up his position behind in accordance with the original plan, puzzled and annoyed at the way things were turning out. For, Cretan as he was, and ready to suspect every one he came near, he yet could not make out which of the five was Achæus, or whether he was there at all. But the path was for the most part precipitous and difficult, and in some places there were abrupt descents which were slippery and dangerous; and whenever they came to one of these, some of the four gave Achæus hand down and the others caught him at the bottom, for they could not entirely conceal their habitual respect for him ; and Bolis was quick to detect by observing this which of them was Achæus, and what place he occupied in the party. When therefore they arrived at the spot at which it had been arranged that Cambylus was to be, Bolis gave the signal by whistle, and the men sprang from their places of concealment and seized the other four, while Bolis himself threw his arms round Achæus, mantle and all, to secure his hands which were inside it ; for he was afraid that having a sword concealed about his person he would attempt to kill himself when he understood what was happening. Being thus quickly surrounded on every side, Achæus fell into the hands of his enemies, and along with his four friends was taken straight off to Antiochus.

The king was in his tent in a state of extreme anxiety awaiting the result. He had dismissed his usual staff, with the exception of two or three aides-de-camp, and sat up alone and sleepless. But when Cambylus and his men entered, and laid Achæus bound upon the ground, he fell into a state of speechless astonishment and for a considerable time could not utter a word ; finally overcome by emotion he burst into tears, caused I have no doubt by this exhibition of the capriciousness of fortune, which defies precaution and calculation alike. For here was Achæus, a son of Andromachus, the brother of Seleucus's queen Laodice, and married to Laodice a daughter of King Mithridates, who had made himself master of all Asia this side of Taurus, and who at that very moment was believed by his own army, as well as by that of his enemy, to be safely ensconced in the strongest position in the world,—sitting bound upon the ground, in the hands of his enemies, before a single person knew of it except those who had effected the capture.

And indeed when at daybreak the king's friends assembled as usual at his tent, and saw this strange spectacle they too felt emotions very like those of the king ; while extreme astonishment made them almost disbelieve the evidence of their senses. However the council met, and a long debate ensued as to what punishment they were to inflict upon Achæus. Finally it was resolved that his extremities should be cut off his head severed from his body and sewn up in the skin of an ass, and his body gibbeted.

When this sentence had been carried out, and the army learnt what had happened, there was such excitement in the ranks and such a rush of the soldiers to the spectacle, that Laodice on the acropolis, who alone knew that her husband had left it, guessed what had happened from the commotion and stir in the camp. And before long a herald arrived, told Laodice what had befallen Achæus, and summoned her to resign the command and quit the acropolis. At first any answer was prevented by an outburst of sorrow and overpowering lamentation on the part of the occupants of the acropolis ; not so much from affection towards Achæus, as from the suddenness and utter unexpectedness of the catastrophe. But this was succeeded by a feeling of hesitation and dismay ; and Antiochus having got rid of Achæus never ceased putting pressure on the garrison of the acropolis, feeling confident that a means of taking it would be put into his hands by those who occupied it, and most probably by the rank and file of the garrison. And this is just what did finally happen : for the soldiers split up into factions, one joining Ariobazus, the other Laodice. This produced mutual distrust, and before long both parties surrendered themselves and the acropolis. Thus Achæus, in spite of having taken every reasonable precaution, lost his life by the perfidy of those in whom he trusted. His fate may teach posterity two useful lessons,—not to put faith in any one lightly ; and not to be over-confident in the hour of prosperity, knowing that, in human affairs, there is no accident which may not happen.

This latter narrative shows clearly the faithlessness with which war was carried on, and the reflections of Polybius on these things are curious. ‘Those,’ he says (viii. 2), ‘who put themselves in the hands of their enemies thoughtlessly are to be blamed, not those who have taken every possible precaution. For to trust nobody at all is impracticable, but if we exact what securities are possible, and act reasonably, we cannot be blamed. The possible securities are oaths, children and women (as hostages), but most of all the previous life (of the parties). To fail in these and fall into trouble is the fault of the doers, not the sufferers. Wherefore it is one's duty to seek out securities as the person who has given them cannot violate. But as such are indeed rarely to be had, our second consideration should be that if we are deceived, we should at least secure the sympathy of mankind, and not forfeit as did most of those whose cases have been told. The plainest and the most proximate example is the case of Achæus, who, taking all possible precautions for his safety and forecasting all that human wisdom could do, nevertheless fell into his enemies' hands. His misfortune, therefore, excites sympathy and pity, but strong resentment against those who did the deed.'

I said before that in the case of Antiochus cruel punishments seemed generally limited to those guilty of his treason, but the details of the campaigns of Philip, who went on about the same time in Greece, and afterwards in Asia Minor, show a general depravation in the habits of war, which I attribute to the constant use of non-Hellenic mercenaries—Thracians and Galatians—whom the rude Greeks, Ætolians and Cretans, but too often imitated. There were no longer, however, those great massacres after a victory which shock us in Athenian and Spartan warfare and upon which I have commented in my earlier study on Social Life in Greece (p. 234). This change arose, of course, from the new character of the armies. The citizen prisoners of a hostile army were hated foes, who could not be reconciled, and whose massacre disabled the enemy. Nowadays the prisoners were mercenaries, who were valuable to anybody who could pay them, and who would fight in a war to the death.¹

¹ Polybius (xi. 13) notices that mercenaries serve very differently

But when it came to plundering or ravaging hostile countries, these mercenaries, who had no land of their own upon which retaliation could be exercised, were of course far more reckless and ruthless than the old citizen militias. Thus Galatians, at least, thought nothing of burning temples, devastating sacred groves and ornamental gardens, and even of rifling the tombs of ancient kings, who had been buried with ornaments and treasure. This was first done with the tombs of the Macedonian kings at Ægæ, which were rifled by the Galatæ serving under Pyrrhus, and he was greatly censured for permitting it.¹ In the wars narrated by Polybius, we have numerous cases of sacrilegious burning of temples, destruction of fair buildings and works of art, and we even find that what the rude Ætolian mercenaries sought for in a captured town was not so much money as valuables of this kind. They had adorned their capital Thermus in this way with great splendour, but were paid in their own coin, when it was taken and ruined in a sudden raid by King Philip V. of Macedon. We find, too, that malcontents making a mutiny about his court when at Corinth, began by 'smashing the china' he had with him. But in after years Philip himself, when he had 'degenerated into a savage tyrant,' was the great offender against the accepted laws of war, destroying wantonly and wickedly the ornaments of his enemies' cities, which were of no moment in settling the dispute. Thus it was he who ruined for ever the fair suburbs of Athens, including the gardens of the philosophers without the walls, by cutting down trees, under democracies and under tyrants. For the former only want them to gain the victory, and then discard them, whereas the more a tyranny flourishes the more it requires them.

¹ Plut. Pyrrhus, 26.

overturning and breaking statues, burning porticoes, and other aimless savagery. He behaved in the same sort of way in the suburbs of Pergamum, and this brutal conduct marks the declension in the Hellenism of this generation.

It is possibly to this period that we may ascribe the rifling of the ancient tombs at Orchomenus and Mycenæ, which were certainly at one time full of treasure, but which have almost all been found empty when excavated by I. Schliemann. What the godless Galatæ began, and did without manifest punishment from either gods or heroes, other mercenaries would soon copy.

In other respects the early years of Philip's reign bear strong points of similarity to those of his contemporaries Antiochus III. and Ptolemy IV. There was apparently the same court life and etiquette, which is so dangerous to kings, and which tends to deliver them into the hands of the most unscrupulous of their favourites. As Antiochus had his vizier Hermeias, who succeeded in getting the whole power into his hands, till he was overthrown by a combination of other courtiers, and as Ptolemy had Sosibius, who was practically king of Egypt through the whole of his reign, so among the advisers of Philip—appointed to their posts by Antigonus Doson—was Apelles, an able man, and very ambitious to take the first place and control the young prince. For this purpose he entered upon the usual system of intrigues, making some of the court his creatures, and removing others either by calumnies, or by praise—a new method of injuring a man, says Polybius, specially invented by courtiers, for by urging that a man be thrown away in a certain post, and so having him removed he can be brought into a new position, which the prince's minister can control. The policy of Apelles was of course opposed to Aratus, whom he desired to sever from the king's intimacy ; he wished, moreover, to reduce the Achæan League to the subject condition of the Thessalians, who seemed to have some independence, but were really vassals of Macedonia.

¹ iv. 87.

I will not detail the intrigues of Apelles, or how he got Philip so to interfere in the elections at Ægion, that Aratus's candidate was beaten, and a Commander of the opposite party, Eperatus, chosen. What concerns me here is to note the importance of the king's vizier ; how he was courted and fêted by all the officers and officials about Philip. 'It happened that Apelles made his residence in Chalcis with more assumption of power (ἐξουσιαστικώτερον) than was his duty ; for he showed that the king was young and master of nothing, and he took upon himself the whole management of affairs. Whereupon the governors of provinces referred everything to him, and the cities of Greece, in their decrees, honours, and gifts, made brief mention of the king, while Apelles was all and everything in them. At this Philip was already annoyed, and bore it with impatience, especially as Aratus, who was in his confidence, took care to keep it before him ; but he submitted for the present, and concealed his sentiments.' Presently Apelles comes to Corinth, where his friends at court 'made a great fuss about him, being commanders of the peltasts and other distinguished regiments, and set on the young men to meet him with ceremony. And when his advent had quite a scenic effect from the number of generals and soldiers that received him, Apelles, as soon as he arrived, came to the court. But when he was about to enter, according to his usual habit, one of the chamberlains stopped him, saying that it was not convenient for the king to receive him. So Apelles stood astonished and perplexed for a long time, and at last turned about and retired. Then all the rest slipped away from him without disguise, so that he reached his lodging attended only by his slaves. A brief season is generally enough to exalt or humble any man, but most of all those about king's palaces. For these are like the men on the abacus, according to the player's wish they count a farthing or a talent; so those at court, according to the king's nod, are either happy or utterly miserable.¹ Thus we see that the whole atmosphere about Philip's court was one of lying about others, plotting against them, wheedling the king, bullying him—in fact all forms of the worst kind of diplomacy, so much so, that Aratus may be considered the best and most honest adviser of the king—Aratus, who would probably have put him to death with tortures, and destroyed the Macedonian kingdom, if it had been in his power, and he had thought it possible to hold together his League without foreign support.

We cannot, then, wonder at the depravation of Hellenism in Greece. The Achæans, the Ætolians, Philip, and their respective allies, were engaged in aimless and perpetually recurring squabbles, nor does one of the leading men or states seem to suspect the real danger till an obscure Ætolian, Agelaos, in a remarkable speech made at a conference for peace at Naupactus (217 B.C.), points out the folly of these petty wars and the urgent necessity of a combination of Hellenism against the coming crisis, the cloud in the west, which would presently grow into a storm.² Polybius goes on to explain that this was the moment which first connected eastern and western politics, and that the cities of Greece and Macedon from henceforth made neither peace nor war without reference to the events in Italy. Presently the islanders and Asiatic Greeks followed the same course, and those who quarrelled with Attalus no longer looked to Antiochus and Ptolemy, but some to the Carthaginians and some to the Romans. The meddlesome and ambitious character of Philip, urged on by the unprincipled adventurer Demetrius of Pharos, would have precipitated things, instead of preparing for a strong defence; throwing his whole power on the side of Hannibal, he made, with many delays, that famous treaty with the Carthaginian, of which Polybius gives us the text,¹ and which secured for him the vengeance of the great Republic. The treaty (as I have already observed) is remarkable for the pomp of the religious sanctions which adorn it, and which sound strange in the mouth of a king whose admirals by and by set up altars to Impiety and to Injustice, and cynically violated every obligation of religion.²

¹ Polyb. v. 26.

² v. 104.

The real collision was of course postponed by the struggles of the second Punic war. The Romans were only able to keep Macedon in check by setting the Ætolians to war with Philip, and supporting them with a fleet, which caused great panic in Greek waters, and indeed behaved with bloodthirstiness and brutality. Allowance must be made for a people in a struggle for existence attacked wantonly by a power not directly concerned in the quarrel.

All these events tended very materially to degrade the Greeks. Peaceful life and contentment were difficult to secure when these perpetual raids and revolutions were going on. We feel it in literature and art. The Athens of that day is strange to us in its insignificance; the Sparta melancholy in its confusion. The once steady and vigorous policy of Macedonia was now directed by a man whose great abilities were chiefly directed to supply gratification for his vices. There was much nominal liberty, but in reality another age of despots had begun.

¹ Polyb. vii. 8. ;

² xviii. 54.

Ptolemy Philopator did not, like his rivals, live a long life, and so endure the fate of being humiliated and conquered by Rome. Probably his debaucheries shortened his days, and he left his throne to his son, a child of five years old. The circumstances of the accession of this child, Ptolemy V., Epiphanes, are so curious, and give us such an insight into the life of Alexandria at that moment, that I will transcribe the narrative from Mr. Shuckburgh's translation of Polybius.¹

[Sosibius, the unfaithful guardian of Ptolemy Epiphanes, was a creature of extraordinary cunning, who long retained his power and was the instrument of many crimes at court: he had contrived first the murder of Lysimachus, son of Arsinoe, daughter of Ptolemy and Berenice; secondly that of Magas, son of Ptolemy and Berenice, the daughter of Magas; thirdly that of Berenice, the mother of Ptolemy Philopator; fourthly that of Cleomenes of Sparta; and fifthly that of Arsinoe, the daughter of Berenice.]

Three or four days after the death of Ptolemy Philopator, Agathocles and Sosibius, having caused a platform to be erected in the largest court of the palace, summoned a meeting of the foot-guards and the Household, as well as the officers of the infantry and cavalry. The assembly being formed they mounted the platform, and first of all announced the death of the king and queen, and proclaimed the customary period of mourning for the people. After that they placed a diadem upon the head of the child, Ptolemy Epiphanes, proclaimed him king, and read a forged will, in which the late king nominated Agathocles and Sosibius guardians of his son. They ended by an exhortation to the officers to be loyal to the boy and maintain his rights. They next brought in two silver urns, one of which they declared contained the ashes of the king, the other those of Arsinoe. And, in fact, one of them did really contain the king's ashes, the other was filled with spices. Having done this they proceeded to complete the funeral ceremonies. It was then that all the world at last learnt the truth about the death of Arsinoe. For now that her death was clearly established, the manner of it began to be a matter of speculation. Though rumours which turned out to be true had found their way among the people they had up to this time been disputed; now there was no possibility of hiding the truth, and it became deeply impressed in the minds of all. Indeed there was great excitement among the populace: no one thought about the king; it was the fate of Arsinoe that moved them. Some recalled her orphanhood; others the tyranny and insult she had endured from her earliest days; and when her miserable death was added to these misfortunes it excited such a passion of pity and sorrow that the city was filled with sighs and tears and irrepressible lamentation. Yet it was clear to the thoughtful observer that these were not so much signs of affection for Arsinoe, as of hatred towards Agathocles.

¹ xv. 26 sq.

The first measure of this minister, after depositing the urns in the royal tombs and giving orders for the laying aside of mourning, was to gratify the army with two months' pay; for he was convinced that the way to deaden the resentment of the common soldiers was to appeal to their interests. He then caused them to take the oath of allegiance customary at the proclamation of a new king; and next took measures to get all who were likely to be formidable out of the country. Philammon, who had been employed in the murder of Arsinoe, he sent out as Governor of Cyrene; while he committed the young king to the charge of Enanthe and Agathocleia. Next, Pelops, the son of Pelops, he despatched to the court of Antiochus (the Great) in Asia, to urge him to maintain his friendly relations with the court of Alexandria, and not to violate the treaty he had made with the young king's father. Ptolemy, son of Sosibius, he sent to Philip to arrange for a treaty of intermarriage between the two countries, and to ask for assistance in case Antiochus should attempt any wholesale violation of existing treaties. He also selected Ptolemy, son of Agesarchus, as ambassador to Rome, not with a view of his seriously prosecuting the embassy, but because he thought that, if he once entered Greece, he would find himself among friends and kinsfolk, and would stay there; which would suit his policy of getting rid of eminent men. Scopas the Ætolian also he

... troops already existing, by sending to the various fort and settlements he used the new recruits to fill up the hold regiments with new men, as well ately round the palace, and in other pa believed that men who had been hir taking his pay, would have no feeling old soldiers, with whom they would b but that, having all their hopes of safe would find them ready to co-operate v his orders. . . .

When he had thus got rid of th and had to a great degree quieted the soldiers by his present of pay, he retur way of life. Drawing round him a l he selected from the most frivolous a personal attendants or servants, he de of the day and night to drunkenness which accompany drunkenness, sparing bride nor virgin, and doing all this wi ostentation. The result was a widespread and when there appeared no prospect of things, or of obtaining protection again lence, and debauchery of the court, which daily more outrageous, the old hatred in the hearts of the common people, a recall the misfortunes which the kingd these very men. But the absence of a lead, and he . . .

to take charge of the boy and administer the government. But when he saw that all those who were fit for this charge were got out of the way, and that Agathocles was boldly monopolising the supreme power, he quickly changed his purpose, because he suspected the danger that threatened him from the hatred which they mutually entertained. He therefore began to draw his troops together, and bestir himself to collect money, that he might not be an easy prey to any enemy. At the same time he was not without hope that the guardianship of the young king, and the chief power in the State, might devolve upon him; both because, in his own private opinion, he was much more fit for it in every respect than Agathocles, and because he was informed that his own troops and those in Alexandria were looking to him to put an end to that minister's outrageous conduct. When such ideas were entertained by Tlepolemus it did not take long to make the quarrel grow, especially as the partisans of both helped to inflame it. Being eager to secure the adhesion of the generals of divisions and the captains of companies, he frequently invited them to drink wine with him; and at these assemblies, instigated partly by the flattery of his guests and partly by his own impulse (for he was a young man and the conversation was over the wine), he used to throw out sarcastic remarks against the family of Agathocles. At first they were covert and enigmatic, then merely ambiguous, and finally undisguised and containing the bitterest reflections. He jibed at him as a mere scribbler of pasquinades, a sackbut-girl and waiting-woman; and spoke of his shameful boyhood, when as cupbearer of the king he had submitted to the foulest treatment. His guests were always ready to laugh at his words and add their quota to the sum of vituperation. It was not long before this reached the ears of Agathocles; and the breach between the two thus becoming an open one Agathocles immediately began bringing charges against Tlepolemus, declaring that he was a traitor to the king, and was inviting Antiochus to come and seize the government. And he brought many plausible proofs of this forward, some of which he got by distorting facts that actually occurred, while others were pure invention. His object in so doing was to excite the wrath of the common people against Tlepolemus. But the result was the reverse; for the populace had long fixed their hopes on Tlepolemus, and were only too

The first step of Agathocles was to the Macedonian guards. He entered th by the young king, and his own sister A feigned not to be able to say what he wis again and again wiping his eyes with h mastered his emotion, and taking the spoke as follows : ‘ Take this boy, whom bed placed in this lady’s arms ’ (pointin fided to your loyalty, men of Macedonia has but little influence in securing this cl that that safety now depends ; his fortu It has long been evident to those who Tlepolemus was aiming at something l rank ; but now he has named the day intends to assume the crown. Do not depend upon my words : refer to those and have but just come from the very With these words he brought forward that he had seen with his own eyes th and the victims being got ready by th the ceremony of a coronation.

When the Macedonian guards had being moved by his appeal, they show hooting and loud murmurs, and dr such a fire of derision, that he got without being conscious how he did it occurred among other corps of the ar selves. Moreover an action of Agathocles himself served to heighten the anger of the multitude and of Tlepolemus. For he took Danae, the latter's mother-in-law, from the temple of Demeter, dragged her through the middle of the city unveiled, and cast her into prison. His object in doing this was to manifest his hostility to Tlepolemus ; but its effect was to loosen the tongues of the people. In their anger they no longer confined themselves to secret murmurings, but some of them in the night covered the walls in every part of the city with pasquinades ; while others in the daytime collected in groups and openly expressed their loathing for the government.

Seeing what was taking place, and beginning to fear the worst, Agathocles at one time meditated making his escape by secret flight ; but as he had nothing ready for such a measure, thanks to his own imprudence, he had to give up that idea. At another time he set himself to drawing out lists of men likely to assist him in a bold coup d'état, by which he should put to death or arrest his enemies, and then possess himself of absolute power. While still meditating these plans he received information that Mœragenes, one of the body-guard, was betraying all the secrets of the palace to Tlepolemus, and was co-operating with him on account of his relationship with Adæus, at that time the commander of Bubastus. Agathocles immediately ordered his secretary, Nicostratus, to arrest Mœragenes, and extract the truth from him by every possible kind of torture. Being promptly arrested by Nicostratus, and taken to a retired part of the palace, he was at first examined directly as to the facts alleged ; but refusing to confess anything, he was stripped ; and now some of the torturers were preparing their instruments, and others with scourges in their hands were just taking off their outer garments, when at that very moment a servant ran in, and after whispering something in the ear of Nicostratus, hurried out again. Nicostratus followed close behind him, without a word, frequently slapping his thigh with his hand. The predicament of Mœragenes was now indescribably strange. There stood the executioners by his side on the point of raising their scourges, while others close to him were getting ready their instruments of torture : but when Nicostratus withdrew they all stood silently staring in each other's faces, expecting him every moment to return : but as time went on they one by one slipped off, until Mœragenes was left alone. Having made his way through the palace, after this unhopèd-for escape, he rushed in his half-clothed state into a tent of the Macedonian guards, which was situated close to the palace. They chanced to be at breakfast, and therefore a good many were collected together; and to them he narrated the story of his wonderful escape. At first they would not believe it, but ultimately were convinced by his appearing without his clothes. Taking advantage of this extraordinary occurrence, Mœragenes besought the Macedonian guards, with tears, 'not only to help him to secure his own safety, but the king's also, and above all their own. For certain destruction stared them in the face,' he said, 'unless they seized the moment when the hatred of the populace was at its height, and every one was ready to wreak vengeance on Agathocles. That moment was now, and all that was wanted was some one to begin.' The passions of the Macedonians were roused by these words, and they finally agreed to do as Mœragenes advised. They at once went round to the tents, first those of their own corps, and then those of the other soldiers; which were all close together facing the same quarter of the city. The wish was one which had for a long time been formed in the minds of the soldiery, wanting nothing but some one to call it forth, and with courage to begin. No sooner, therefore, had a commencement been made than it blazed out like a fire: and before four hours had elapsed every class whether military or civil had agreed to make the attempt.

At this crisis, too, chance contributed a great deal to the final catastrophe. For a letter addressed by Tlepolemus to the army, as well as some of his spies, had fallen into the hands of Agathocles. The letter announced that he would be at Alexandria shortly, and the spies informed Agathocles that he was already there. This news so distracted Agathocles that he gave up taking any measures at all, or even thinking about the dangers which surrounded him, but departed at his usual hour to his wine, and kept up the carouse to the end in his usual licentious fashion.

But his mother, Cœnanthe, went in great distress to the temple of Demeter, which was open on account of a certain annual sacrifice; and there first of all she besought the aid of these goddesses with bendings of the knee and magic incantations; and after that she sat down close to the altar and remained motionless. Most of the women present, delighted to witness her dejection and distress, kept silence : but the ladies of the family of Polycrates and certain others of the nobility, being as yet unaware of what was going on round them, approached Cœnanthe and tried to comfort her. But she cried out in a loud voice : ‘Do not come near me, you monsters ! I know you well ! Your hearts are always against us ; and you pray the goddess for all imaginable evil upon us. Still I trust and believe that, God willing, you shall one day taste the flesh of your own children.’ With these words she ordered her female attendants to drive them away, and strike them with their staves if they refused to go. The ladies availed themselves of this excuse for quitting the temple in a body, raising their hands and praying that she might herself have experience of those very miseries with which she had threatened her neighbours.

The men having by this time decided upon a revolution, now that in every house the anger of the women was added to the general resentment the popular hatred blazed out with redoubled violence. As soon as night fell the whole city was filled with tumult, torches, and hurrying feet. Some were assembling with shouts in the stadium ; some were calling upon others to join them ; some were running backwards and forwards seeking to conceal themselves in houses and places least likely to be suspected. And now the open spaces round the palace, the stadium, and the street were filled with a motley crowd, as well as the area in front of the Dionysian Theatre. Being informed of this, Agathocles roused himself from a drunken lethargy,—for he had just dismissed his drinking party,—and accompanied by all his family, with the exception of Philo, went to the king. After a few words of lamentation over his misfortunes addressed to the child, he took him by the hand, and proceeded to the covered walk which was between the Maeander-garden and the Palaestra, and leads to the entrance of the theatre. Having securely fastened the two first doors through which he passed, he entered the third with two or three body-guards, his own family, and the king. The doors, however, which were secured by double bars, were only of lattice-work and could therefore be seen through.

By this time the mob had collected from every part of the city, in such numbers, that not only was every foot of ground

Day now began to break and the fused babel of voices ; but one cry more loudly above the rest, it was a call for something actually done was by the Macedonians their quarters and seized the vestibule and audience hall of the palace ; then after ascertained whereabouts in the palace they round to the covered walk, burst open the door when they came to the next demand that the young king should be surrendered. On recognising his danger, begged his boon of his name to the Macedonians to inform the king of his guardianship of the king, and all offices and honours which he possessed, and only as he be granted him with a bare maintenance. In his original situation in life he would not even if he wished it, of being henceforth a king. All the body-guards refused, except Antiochus who afterwards obtained the chief power in the empire.

This man was an Acarnanian, and, in the life when he obtained supreme power, he made a most excellent and blameless government of his kingdom. And as he was distinguished by his had he been remarkable before for his wisdom in the time of his prosperity. He was told by Antigonus Agathocles at his house, to distinguish his guests by the present of a gold diadem, a custom to the kings alone ; he was the their hands to protect him, and successfully begged his life. He accordingly returned with orders to bring the king or to come no more himself. Having dismissed Aristomenes with these words, the Macedonians proceeded to burst open the second door also. When convinced by their proceedings, no less than by the answer they had returned, of the fierce purpose of the Macedonians, the first idea of Agathocles was to thrust his hands through the latticed door,—while Agathocleia did the same with her breasts, which she said had suckled the king,—and by every kind of entreaty to beg that the Macedonians would grant him bare life.

But finding that his long and piteous appeals produced no effect, at last he sent out the young king with the body-guards. As soon as they had got the king the Macedonians placed him on a horse and conducted him to the stadium. His appearance being greeted with loud shouts and clapping of hands, they stopped the horse, and dismounting the child, ushered him to the royal stall and seated him there. But the feelings of the crowd were divided: they were delighted that the young king had been brought, but they were dissatisfied that the guilty persons had not been arrested and met with the punishment they deserved. Accordingly they continued with loud cries to demand that the authors of all the mischief should be brought out and made an example. The day was wearing away, and yet the crowd had found no one on whom to wreak their vengeance, when Sosibius, who, though a son of the elder Sosibius, was at that time a member of the body-guard, and as such had a special eye to the safety of the king and the state,—seeing that the furious desire of the multitude was implacable, and that the child was frightened at the unaccustomed faces that surrounded him and the uproar of the crowd, asked the king whether ‘he would surrender to the populace those who had injured him or his mother.’ The boy having nodded assent, Sosibius bade some of the body-guard announce the king’s decision, while he raised the young child from his seat and took him to his own house, which was close by, to be taken care of and refreshed. When the message from the king was declared, the whole place broke out into a storm of cheering and clapping of hands. But meanwhile Agathocles and Agathocleia had separated, and gone each to their own lodgings. Without loss of time, soldiers, some voluntarily and others under pressure from the crowd, started in search of them.

The beginning of actual bloodshed, however, was this. One of the servants and flatterers of Agathocles, whose name was Philo, came out to the stadium still flushed with wine. Seeing the fury of the multitude, he said to some bystanders that they would have cause to repent it again as they had only the other day, if Agathocles were to come there. Of those who heard him some began to abuse him, while others pushed him about; and on his attempting to defend himself some tore his cloak off his back, while others thrust their spears into him and wounded him mortally. He was dragged into the middle of the crowd breathing his last gasp; and, having thus tasted blood, the multitude began to look impatiently for the coming of the other victims. They had not to wait long: first appeared Agathocles dragged along bound hand and foot. No sooner had he entered than some soldiers rushed at him and struck him dead. And in doing so they were his friends rather than enemies, for they saved him from the horrible death which he deserved. Nikon was brought next; and after him Agathocleia stripped naked, with her two sisters; and following them the whole family. Last of all some men came bringing Cœnanthe, whom they had torn from the temple of Demeter and Persephone, riding stripped naked upon a horse. They were all given up to the populace, who bit and stabbed them, and knocked out their eyes; and as soon as any one of them fell tore him limb from limb, until they had torn them all into shreds: for the savagery of the Egyptians when their passions are roused is indeed terrible. At the same time some young girls who had been brought up with Arsinoë, having learnt that Philammon, the chief agent in the murder of that queen, had arrived three days before from Cyrene, rushed to his house; forced their way in; killed Philammon himself with stones and sticks; strangled his infant son; and, not content with this, dragged his wife naked into the street and put her to death.

Such is the view we obtain into the condition of the Egyptian court, as well as of the character of the Alexandrian populace.

The effects of this affair on foreign politics were not more respectable. The two remaining sovereigns of the Hellenistic world, Philip V. and Antiochus III., combined to dismember and appropriate the infant's dominions, and forthwith proceeded to carry out this infamous design. But Philip, who took up the naval part of the attack, found himself confronted by the Rhodians and Attalus, who were determined not to allow the balance of power to be destroyed, and their combined fleets were a match for him. He only succeeded in making enemies all through the Levant by his cruelty and savage devastation of fair cities and temples, while his ally Antiochus seems to have left him the burden of the war, and did not advance into Coele-Syria and Palestine till five years later.

While Philip was thus playing away all his advantages, spending his energy and his resources in foolish or iniquitous war, Antiochus had obtained the position of a great monarch with a great empire. Had he confined himself to these possessions he would probably have escaped his disgrace and downfall at Magnesia.

I have spent so much time in exhibiting the degradation of the principal Hellenistic courts at this critical period, that I must remind the reader that there were still religion and morals in the world. And first of all, what we know of king Attalus and of the Rhodians in the war just mentioned shows that they at least had clear notions of duty, and could sacrifice a great deal for the common good. Indeed the panegyric of Attalus which Polybius gives us shows how excellent a prince he was, and how much respected by all the Hellenistic world. I shall defer to a subsequent chapter some interesting details of both the courtesy and savagery shown side by side in the curious moral kaleidoscope which this generation presents to us.

CHAPTER

THE GRADUAL SUBJECTION OF THE CRISIS IN GREECE AND ASIA MINOR

WE have now reached that epoch in which the influence of Rome became preponderant in the next half-century, roughly speaking, we have a mere record of the steps by which the East was accomplished. The principal events were four. First, we have the second Macedonian war (200-197), which ended with the battle of Cynoscephalæ; secondly, the first Punic war (264-190), which ended with the battle of Actium; thirdly, the third Macedonian war (with Perseus, 172-168), which ended with the battle of Pydna (172-168); and fourthly, the war against Corinth (146 B.C.), which marked the end of eastern warfare against foreign powers.

well as to Hellenistic history, and so we may presuppose an acquaintance with the main facts even in the general reader. We have also now acquired a new authority of great moment in Polybius, whose history, though for the most part only preserved in excerpt or epitome, gives a very clear idea of the politics and manners of his time.

But, unfortunately, it is a time rather of war and of politics than of intellectual and social life, for the constant wars of Philip, of the Ætolians, of the Spartan despots, and then of the Romans, involved all the peace-loving states, and so there was in Greece itself great distress and devastation, which at times extended to Asia Minor, and which dealt a blow to Greek life from which it never recovered. The most prosperous states of Alexander's old empire were now Pergamum and Rhodes, which were protected partly by their position, partly by the favour of the Romans, till they were no longer of service against their neighbours. Egypt seems fallen asleep; she is with difficulty able to protect her boundaries from invasion, and owes it to Roman interference that she is not actually conquered by her old rival, Syria, whom she had so often defeated.

It strikes the student of the complicated politics of these times that both Egypt and Syria have become estranged from the atmosphere of Hellenism, and pursue a policy of their own, which might have led to a long period of independence but for Antiochus III. being induced by the Ætolians and by Hannibal to attack Rome in Greece. Philip had indeed persuaded him to join in dismembering Egypt, and had thus caused the Romans to interfere diplomatically in favour of Egypt, which accepted at once their supremacy, and sought consistently to keep on good and friendly terms with Rome. We may attribute this far-seeing policy to the wise ministers of Philopator and nently forward. Rhodes, Pergamum was this the case, Polybius noticed that hitherto Syria had hardly seen the Achæans, whereas the very or Egypt.¹ Antiochus Epiphanes who cultivated friendly relations from the alliances sought in time closer to the source of Hellenism. Egyptian documents that in the (Ptolemy Epiphanes) there was a against Greek influences, and the national side that he regained his Egypt. Plutarch notices, in connections of the famous Cleopatra monarchs of the house of Ptolemy the trouble to learn Egyptian, identify themselves with Hellenism.

The Rosetta stone gives us the proclamation of Epiphanes, as king

¹ Polyb. xxix. 24.

² Flamininus compared the army of many delicacies to which he had been in habit. How he had been used to it.

nine years after his accession. The young king was then fourteen years old. Polybius alludes several times to this proclamation, on the occasion of which all the friendly powers, including the Achæans, sent deputations of congratulation. The king had already been betrothed to the daughter of Antiochus the Great; with the dowry of Cœle-Syria and Judæa promised, he was married to her when he was seventeen. But Polybius regards the whole ceremony as an arrangement among his Greek ministers when they had got rid of the dangerous mercenary leaders, the Ætolians Scopas and Dicæarchus, who were assuming too great importance, Scopas indeed outrageously refusing to obey the royal summons.¹ He tells us that Aristomenes and Polycrates were the men who managed the affair and retained the power. But he seems quite ignorant of the important facts disclosed by the Rosetta stone.

This famous document, which afforded the key to the reading of the hieroglyphs, was found, as is well known, by the French, in throwing up defences at Rosetta, but after the battle of Aboukir was taken by the English and sent home to the British Museum. It turned out to be (like the inscription of Tanis) a decree drawn up by the priests assembled in conclave, this time for the formal proclamation of Ptolemy Epiphanes as king, in the ninth year of his reign and the fourteenth of his age, when he was considered to have attained his majority. It is dated the 27th March, 196 B.C., or the day after the coronation. As we have already learned the style of these documents from previous specimens, the reader will be satisfied with a compendium of the sense. But I may point out how completely the whole ceremony, proclamation, and decree

¹ ὁ πάντων ἐστὶν ἐσχάτος, Polyb. xxviii. 35.

father, the lord of crowns, the lished Egypt, and is pious toward adversaries, that has set up the periods, like Hephæstus the Gree king of the upper and lower coun
Philopators, whom Hephæstus ha
Sun has given the victory, the livi
the Sun, Ptolemy, the everliving, follow the priests and priestesses,
month, and day of the month.
priests who assembled at Memphi
King Ptolemy, the god Epiphanc being assembled in the temple of Pt
As the king has set up and hono spent great sums in the prosperity remitted taxes and debts, and reli annual homage at Alexandria, and i things existing in the first year of oppressive burdens on them], and military class who had returned, were disloyal in the days of the re remain on their lands ; and sent ou

etc., and to place an image of him in every temple, to be called the image of Ptolemy, the avenger of Egypt, with daily sacrifices hereby specified. Moreover, it shall be set in a shrine of wood gilt, and in order that it may be distinguished from others, it is to be adorned with asps and crowns according to the following fashion (here follow the 'heraldic' details), and his birthday is to be a feast, and there is to be a priest of Epiphanes,' etc.

Imagine a Greek sovran having such a protocol composed for him, or its being composed first in Greek, as Letronne insists ! The political importance of this document, which seems a mere address of congratulation, has only lately been made clear by M. Revillout. He shows that sundry national deliverers (in fact Mahdis) had sprung up under the tyranny of Philopator, and that the declaration of the divinity of Epiphanes, and his therefore legitimate sovranity, was intended by the court as a religious counterblast to their claims, which was no doubt obtained by large concessions to the priests.¹ Such, however, was the ceremony of installing a new king in Egypt, with executions and cruelties as well as with benevolences and festivities. Let us return to Greece.

As soon as Philip was crushed at Cynoscephalæ, the leading part in Eastern politics was taken up by the Ætolians, who all through their history show a far larger policy and wider interests than the Achæans. Their league was spread over many coasts and islands, reaching even to the Hellespont. They had intimate relations with Egypt for a long time, seeing that they were constantly supplying mercenary generals and armies, and that the Queen of Philadelphus had founded one of the many towns called Arsinoe there.

¹ Cf. Rev. égypt. i. 4, 153.

They seem from the first to have had close relations with Pergamum, and it was through them that Attalus was brought in contact with the Romans when all three powers joined against Philip. They played no unimportant part in the campaign against Philip, and boasted all over Greece that it was they who had won the battle of Cynoscephalæ, while Flamininus had stood praying with his hands raised to heaven. It was their disappointment at the settlement made by the Roman that first showed itself in loud complaints that he was bribed, and ultimately in the stirring up of the war of Antiochus with Rome. They were the one power in Greece which showed a stubborn resistance, and gave the Romans real trouble to conquer them. The Ætolian commander, instead of figuring like Perseus in the Roman triumph, escaped from the dungeon at Rome, where he was kept in preparation for it, and when surrounded by his pursuers committed suicide. The mediation of the Ætolians was often offered and accepted by other states when at war.

Thus the historical position of this league, directed by a set of mountaineer chiefs, who had gained wealth and experience in foreign service, is quite at variance with the picture drawn by Polybius of their character and policy. He says they were not punished, and were tolerated in Greece, because consistent injustice and dishonesty escape far better than single acts of this kind. He says they were only desirous of plunder and personal aggrandisement. He has left us no hint of what policy they pursued, or what condition they would have maintained in Greece had they succeeded in persuading or forcing the rest of Greece to join them. We get not a single glimpse into their home life and habits beyond the wealth and luxury of Thermus. They produced, however, not only good speakers and literary men at Alexandria, but, as we see in the case of Agelaos of Naupactus, good politicians, who saw perfectly the folly of petty border wars and the necessity of a strong and honest union among Greeks. If they had left us a historian, we should perhaps rate them far higher than the cautious and trimming Achæans, who sought to obtain by diplomacy what the Ætolians won by arms, and who after all attained their highest ideal in Philopœmen, who was far more of the Ætolian than the Achæan type.

But neither League ever produced a really great statesman and general. We have already seen what Aratus was. This sketch we have of Philopœmen shows a hardy mountaineer delighting not in formal athletics, but in sport, in agriculture, and above all in war, thus showing the modern features of Hellenism as against the athletic habit of Aratus. He was, moreover, a good tactician and brave; but as a politician, quite useless, or worse than useless. He could not brook opposition, and preferred spending the periods when he was out of office in mercenary raiding through Crete rather than in guiding and advising the policy of his country. He was very vindictive, resenting the anger of his city at his own sulky exile, and avenging himself upon the Spartans by a cruel and bloody execution and overthrow of their constitution. In fact he was the man who first took Sparta, and abolished the forms called those of Lycurgus. Thus then, if we omit the love of personal adornment and the rapacity shown by most of the Ætolian clephts, we have in Philopœmen the same type of man—a sort of generous enthusiast with a talent for war and for leading men, but with no head for politics, like our modern Garibaldi. But unfortunately the Victor Emanuel of those days, Antigonus Doson, did not live to control him, and so his democratic and socialistic tendencies were constantly breaking out with his bad temper, much to the disturbance of the usual timocratic management of the league.

The most striking feature of the period from Cynoscephalæ to Pydna (197-168 B.C.) was, of course, the rapidly altering relations of the Hellenistic world to Rome. In the struggle against Philip the Romans found it easy to pose as liberators, as phil-Hellenes, as honourable and grave benefactors of Greece. Even the very generous, and perhaps unwise settlement made by Flamininus after his victory, by which Greece was left ungarrisoned in the face of an attack from Antiochus, corroborated that opinion. Hence there must have been many who looked upon the Romans at first as the saviours of true Hellenism.¹

¹ Here is the character of the Romans drawn in the first book of the Maccabees, a sober and trustworthy history (viii. 1 sq.): 'And Judas had heard the name of the Romans, that they are mighty in strength, and are well esteemed among all who ally themselves to them, and that whosoever come unto them they establish friendship with them, and are mighty in strength. And it was told him concerning their wars, and their valour which they showed against the Galatians, and that they had conquered them and brought them under tribute; and what things they did in the land of Spain to gain possession of the mines of silver and of gold which are there. And how they have conquered every place with their counsel and their patience, even if the place were very far from them; and of the kings that went up against them from the ends of the earth, how they crushed them and smote them mightily, and the rest pay them yearly tribute. And Philip and Perseus, kings of the Citieis, who were lifted up against them, they smote in war and conquered them. And Antiochus the Great, who came against them in war, having 120 elephants and horses and chariots and a great army, he too was overthrown by them. And they took him alive and made him and those that were kings with him to pay a great tribute, and give hostages. And the Indian country, and Media and Lydia, of their fairest possessions, taking them from him they gave them to Eumenes the king. And how those of Greece counselled to come and attack them, and the plan was made known, and they went against the Greeks, and fought against them, and there fell of the Greeks many wounded, and their wives and children were taken captives, and

The character of T. Flamininus, as drawn by Plutarch in his Life, shows us clearly what the enlightened Roman of that day was. He was trained in speaking Greek by residence at Tarentum, and no doubt a Roman noble at that moment found a knowledge of Greek as valuable as our officials now find speaking Turkish or Arabic when there is a crisis in the East. In another generation or two Greek became as fashionable at Rome as French is among our higher classes, and though the Greeks found great difficulty in learning Latin the Romans seem to have been able to learn a practical use of Greek well enough. But in Flamininus's day it was still an exception, and therefore a distinction. We see this plainly enough in the man's vanity. He was far more anxious to pose as one of the Æneadæ and the patron of Greece than to guard the interests of Rome. We find too that his interests were rather too promiscuous, extending in some curious way even to the tyrant Nabis, whom he refused to punish personally, or their land was taken and their strongholds destroyed, and they were enslaved up to this day. And the rest of the kingdoms and islands, as many as resisted them, they smote and enslaved. But with their friends and them that trusted in them they kept friendship, and they had the power over kingdoms far and near, and as many as heard their name were afraid of them. Whomsoever they desired to help and make them kings, these did reign; but whomsoever they would they set aside, and they were greatly exalted. And yet among them all no man put on a diadem, nor was clothed in purple to be adorned with it. And they made them a council chamber, and 320 of them took counsel every day upon all that concerned the people that it might be well ordered, and they entrust one man to rule them for a year, and to be lord of all their country, and all obey the one, and there is no envy or jealousy among them.'

This picture of the Romans, as they first impressed the East, is very interesting, especially as they very soon changed both in character and in the estimation of the world. This is apparent even in the second Maccabees, which is of later date and different tone.

dispossess. However, with all his faults, his vanity, his restlessness in going about Greece with intercession, with advice, with sentimental compliments, he appears to us a Roman really civilised and softened with Hellenistic culture. Had such men—Scipio Africanus, Æm. Paullus, Scipio Æmilianus—been able to control affairs, the Roman interference in the empire of Alexander would have been very differently accepted. But even they must in the end have learned the mistake of allowing the Greeks freedom to carry on raids and border wars, democratic revolutions and aristocratic reactions, attended with slaughter and confiscation, and if ever they had insisted upon internal quiet the so-called ‘freedom of all the Greeks’ would have been violated in sentiment, and produced a bitter anti-Roman feeling.

But there were far different, and far more common Roman types than T. Flamininus. There were, of course, downright ruffians like his brother L. Flamininus, whose outrages caused indignation even at Rome, and led to his expulsion from the senate, though we hear from Plutarch that the sympathy of the Roman mob was with him, when he appeared after his degradation in the ‘top gallery’ at the theatre. This man’s conduct happened to come under the elder Cato’s notice, and as it coincided with an antipathy in politics, was published and punished. But how many outrages of rude and brutal Romans were committed with impunity! There were again characters like Q. Marcius Philippus, who went through the Hellenistic world with cynical frankness, producing scrapes and quarrels, and embroiling the various states with one another and with Rome, by a system of deliberate lying. Even Livy (xlii. 47) comments on this so-called new diplomacy, which was gravely censured by the older and more respectable senators. But these were in the minority, and Q. Marcius was supported and honoured. It is an interesting fact that this man, so rash as a soldier, so treacherous as a peacemaker, was sixty years old when he was first sent to Greece, and not an active man in body, being apparently very stout.¹

And there were other haughty Romans, who, if they disdained deceit and lying, also disdained to recognise the constitutional rights of the Greeks, and posed as insolent masters,² when they were officially mere commissioners of the senate. It was indeed, as Mommsen says, the age of commissions. Parties of three or of ten Roman senators were perpetually travelling about the Levant, bringing orders from Rome, making reports, settling disputes; and yet they hardly ever settled anything. The Hellenistic world was kept in a chronic state of seething and irritation, destructive to home life, to culture, to letters. No public dispute could be settled without sending ambassadors to Rome, and then the answers of the senate were always feeble, halting, and often contradictory to previous decisions.

The causes of this extraordinarily weak government on the part of a strong nation—and a nation with no feebleness when the vital interests of Rome were concerned—were three, which we may recognise in the politics of our own day. In the first place, the interests of the subject or semi-subject nations were subordinated to party politics and the interests of important men at Rome. Flaminius's infamous brother was attacked, and defended, upon party grounds ; the incompetent and perhaps corrupt brother of the great Scipio was appointed consul, and afterwards prosecuted and banished, for party reasons. The bonds of family, or of policy, in both cases overrode considerations of justice. Secondly, there was a sentimental vein in the policy of Rome, which, though an amiable weakness, was distinctly of very mischievous effects. It arose from the vanity of posing as cultivated, and as aristocrats in civilisation, which appears in the very first Roman communications with Greece, and the anxiety to rank as descendants of Æneas and colonists from Ilium. This vulgar mawkishness about Greek liberties, this anxiety to redress historical wrongs, to regard the Greeks as a down-trodden people, whom they had a mission to liberate, was not indeed intensified by the remorse that their own forefathers had been the oppressors. Luckily the old Greeks had conquered Troy, and so the pangs of conscience, which now so deeply affect a Gladstone and a Morley for the sins of their ancestors, could hardly affect a Marcius or a Quinctius.

¹ Livy, xliv. 4, speaking of Perseus: 'Nec ipse [Perseus] certamini adfuit, cum Romanus imperator major sexaginta annis et prægravis corpore omnia militaria munera ipse impigre obiret.'

² Such was the Cæcilius who attempted to convoke the Achæan League upon his own authority (Polyb. xxii. 13), and probably the Octavius who was murdered in Apamea with open acclamations, and with the impunity of the murderer. This latter case will be discussed in a subsequent chapter.

But the sentimentality was there, and was constantly producing effusive declarations, often mischievous concessions, always immoral encouragements to the Greeks to ventilate their grievances. For thirdly, in curious contrast to this excess of sentiment, there was a complete absence of real sympathy between the Romans and their subjects. No people were more thoroughly wrapt up in themselves, satisfied with their own greatness, and dull to understand the wants and wishes of any clever and sagacious nation. The quick-witted and the sensitive are sure to be misunderstood by the narrow and the dull. Thus the Romans were always asking, What do you want? How can we satisfy you? and the Greeks (including those of Asia Minor) were so various in their demands that there seemed no possibility of getting a definite answer.

Of course the cry for Home Rule was the most obvious. Let then all the Greeks be free and independent. This was the solution of T. Flamininus. What was the result? The Ætolians did not receive out of the spoils of the victory over Philip what they thought their due. They had possessed towns in Thessaly which Philip had taken, and which were now declared free and independent. What did they do? They called in the nearest foreign power available, Antiochus the Great of Syria, and made him pose as the 'liberator of the Greeks.' This astonishes Plutarch (Life of Titus Fl. 15), who says, how could they want a liberator when they were already free? But the Ætolians wanted license. They wanted the right of private wars and plunders. They wanted the right of extending their league to the unwilling North. So there resulted another great war.

When the Ætolians were crushed and reduced to impotence, but not to peace from terrible and bloody internal disorders, the same problem rose again as regards the Peloponnesus. The Achæans ruled most of it, and seemed a respectable and orderly government. They were allowed to extend the sway of the League over the whole peninsula. What were the results? First they tried to secure Zakynthus (Zante) beyond its limits, and were greatly offended when the Romans said no, and advised them to confine themselves within the bounds of the Peloponnesus.

But even within these bounds what happened? There were two states in Peloponnesus, Sparta and Messene, which had long been opposed to the League, which had suffered greatly at its hands in former days, and which were therefore bitterly opposed to the Achæans in traditions, in sentiment, and in policy. They could no more believe in the justice of government by the Achæan League than the Protestants or loyal Catholic people in the north and east of Ireland can believe in just government under the 'National' League. The latter aims at ruling all the island, as Aratus and his party aimed at ruling the whole Peloponnesus. But was not Philopœmen been one of the main factors in the victory of Sellasia, which deprived Sparta of her noblest king? Then when a party in each of these states arranged a junction with the League, this formal union was the direct cause of dreadful revolutions, which ended in the disruption of the league and the complete ruin of Home Rule in Greece. The Achæan and the anti-Achæan parties within Sparta and Messene were as violently opposed as are the Roman Catholics and the Protestants in Belfast, and behaved as we might see the Belfast parties behave if there were a Home Rule Parliament established in Dublin. Revolutions and murders, followed by bloody executions on the part of the Home Rule government, led to continual missions and complaints at Rome, with feeble attempts on the part of the senate to make peace, to moderate party violences, and yet to interfere as little as possible. Once they tried a policy of absolute refusal to interfere, when more bloodshed and disorder broke out. Another time they saved Spartan landlords, who were condemned to death by the Achæan government, and forbade sentences of death against Spartans, while they ordered that Sparta should still obey the quasi-National League. Thus the senate pleased nobody and offended everybody, among all the warring parties, especially by the policy of non-intervention.

Need we wonder then that a party arose in the various states whose open object it was to abolish all this turmoil, this confusion, this violence, and substitute for it the direct government of Rome? These Unionists have a very large name in the history of the period. Some of them, like the Epirote Charops, were downright snobs, who had left their country to live at Rome, learn Latin and Roman manners, and who had doubtless come back with a supreme contempt for everything Greek or national. Others calculated upon becoming Roman agents, and making money of their sycophancy. They were mere base flatterers, who traduced the popular party, acted as spies and informers, and justly earned popular detestation. Such is the account of them we hear in Polybius.

But if the nationalist press of Ireland were to survive as the only evidence of what has happened there in our own days, what sort of picture would posterity have of the Unionists? And though I should be very sorry indeed to put Polybius on a level with the publicists of modern Ireland, yet he was a busy politician for the Home Rule party of his day, and shared in their anger and their grief. There must have been many respectable people who felt that in Roman protection alone could they trust for the security of their lives and property, and that the loss of political liberty of the imperial kind was worth enduring for the sake of personal liberty and protection from the license of lawless men around them. They had before them as examples the many cities of Asia; which prospered under the suzerainty of some great power, nor did they anticipate the dreadful commercial tyranny with which the Roman capitalists crushed all mercantile enterprise but their own out of the world.

From what we know of the national party even through their respectable members, like Polybius, we see in them much violence; we see too a strong tendency to misstate and colour facts. Thus he tells us¹ how three envoys went to Rome, being practically represented by one of them on the Unionist side, Callicrates, who said what he liked and totally misled the senate, while the other two members, who bore the great names of Aratus and Lydiades, the old leaders of the national party, not only did nothing, but were even perfectly ignorant of all that was going on, so that the traitor was elected Commander of the Achæan League on his return! Is this credible?¹ or can we believe that if the Romans had retired completely from the Greek world there would have been peace and happiness there? If this had been possible, it would have been under such a ruler as Antigonus Doson, or as Attalus, not under a crowd of well-matched and rival polities. But how precarious was the position of Eumenes II., Attalus's successor, appears from the interesting discussion before the senate, which I shall quote hereafter.

¹ xxiv. 10-12.

The crisis of all these things came with the war against Perseus. For nearly twenty years the senate had been arbitrating and settling and conceding to the various states of the Greek world, and yet at the end of that time, when the son of Philip, whom they had conquered, and who had striven to enslave Greece, rose up against Rome, all the sympathies of the Greek world, of all Hellenism, went with him. The Romans were indeed able to isolate Macedonia diplomatically. Nobody dared to refuse them material support and auxiliary troops. But the campaign, which was long and arduous, must have made it quite plain that the Greek troops were fighting against the grain. From non-combatants too in the towns they must have experienced plenty of scowls and muttered curses, and the philo-Roman party could tell plenty of stories about secret missions and hopes, of delight at the Roman defeats, and longing that the Macedonian might win. Thus then the Romans had striven for twenty-five years to liberate and to pacify the Greeks, and their attempts had turned out a complete failure. The only remedy was either to abandon the eastern empire they had acquired, or to make a clean sweep of the national party both in Macedonia, in Epirus, and in Greece, and so reduce the troublesome peninsula to peace.

¹ The account of this embassy must have been obtained by Polybius from the younger Aratus. It is hard to acquit the patriots of having told some desperate lies to cover their own apparent inaction.

In the case of Macedonia, a conquered foe, it was easy enough. The ancient laws of war justified the Romans in carrying off the whole of the better classes to Italy, and so leaving the country without leaders, without intellect, without capital, and moreover separated into four distinct divisions without right of commerce or connection.

In the case of the Achæans, who had formally supported Rome in the war, and had carefully abstained from every public act or vote against Rome, the matter was more difficult. It was a decided stretch of prerogative, nay, an act of tyranny, to establish a court of inquiry into opinions, and to punish secret sympathy with Perseus. So when Xenon offered to be tried anywhere, even in Italy, confiding in the justice of the national cause, the Romans jumped at the legal excuse, and deported 1000 leading Achæans to Italy.

This great act of deportation, accompanied by large executions and sales into slavery in Macedonia, Epirus, and Ætolia, was the death-blow of the Greek section of Hellenism. The old cities of Greece, once the leaders of the race, were long since effete, and produced no men of mark. The only possibility of regenerating the country lay in the outlying peoples, the mountaineers, the fresher and even semi-

Hellenic neighbours, who showed so much vigour in the preceding century. All the cream of this population, those who had gained traditions, amassed capital, acquired culture, were now swept away.

The whole tendency of the anti-Roman movement in Greece and in Greek-speaking lands was strictly democratic, and often socialistic. Nowhere do we hear of the propertied classes siding against Rome. In the Achæan troubles, which ended in the tragic destruction of Corinth by Mummius, nothing is clearer than this socialistic and democratic complexion of the rising, for war it can hardly be called. The leading patriots, such as Diæus and Critolaus, who made wild speeches against Rome, and hounded on the mob to violences against both the moderate party and the Unionists, were so disreputable that we can hardly dignify them with the name of enthusiasts. They seem to have given and taken bribes, and to have used their power for personal gain as well as to carry out their policy. They did not even show decent personal courage, or any determination to die in battle for their country, so that the last bloody act in the drama, before the reeking curtain of the smoke of Corinth hides the stage, has no redeeming grandeur, such as that which ennobles the fall of Carthage in the very same momentous year. It is manifest that the Hellenistic democracies, had they been victorious, were worthless to carry on the work of Hellenistic culture.

We have no great writer to picture to us the condition of Greece on the outbreak of the last revolt, but even the tame historians of the day grow eloquent when they describe the gloom and the terror, the anguish and the despair, which pervaded the Peloponnesus at this crisis. Those who had anything to hope for, anything to lose, did not know which of the two awful alternatives to prefer—the tyranny of the mad patriots, with a desperate mob behind them, who did not hesitate to execute with horrible tortures the advocates of moderation ; or the conquest of the ruthless Romans, so stern and bloody in its thoroughness. On the whole, those who escaped execution or slavery found the Roman conquest the advent of peace, though it entailed upon them political annihilation and commercial ruin.

The political conditions of the Greek peninsula were so peculiar, and they came so directly into conflict with Rome, that it seemed desirable to anticipate somewhat in describing this crisis, which shows in an acute form what happened gradually or chronically elsewhere. It was chiefly owing to Roman interference that the Hellenistic world, once a great unity, is at this time separated into three groups of powers, easily enough distinguished by their relative geographical proximity to Rome. First we have the Hellenic peninsula, including Macedonia, whose fortunes we have discussed. Then we have the coasts and islands of Asia Minor, comprising politically Pergamum, Rhodes, and the crowd of Greek cities in various relations of dependence to these powers. Thirdly we have the remoter kingdoms of Pontus and Bithynia, Syria and Egypt, which the Romans never included in their sentimental phil-Hellenism, but always treated as oriental foreigners.

Perhaps this was right. Quite apart from the greater distance of these kingdoms from Rome, and the impossibility of embracing them at once under her sway, there had been, as I have already explained, a distinct reaction of nationalities upon the less thickly sown seed of Alexander's sowing. Yet still the life of independent Hellenism lasted longer the more it lay beyond the reach of Rome, until the days came that all the world drifted together into its one great empire. In this chapter, however, we may add to what has been said about Greece a word on the condition of Asia Minor, or the remainder of what the Romans regarded as real Hellenism.

Polybius has given us a very interesting account of the scene at Rome when all Asia came to congratulate the senate on the victory over Antiochus, and also over the Galatians (189 B.C.) Amid the many embassies from free towns and from dynasts who only sought to obtain by politeness the permission to stay as they were, there were two of graver import—King Eumenes II., who had suffered great danger and loss in the war, being besieged by Antiochus, and with difficulty rescued from destruction; and the Rhodians, whose fleet had been of capital importance in staying Antiochus, as well as in securing the sea communications of the Roman legions. What rewards were these useful allies—thorough Greeks, too, from the very country that had sent Æneas to Italy—to receive?

When the day of audience came, the senate first called in Eumenes, and invited him to state candidly what he thought the senate ought to grant him. But he said that, as the Romans themselves would advise him to show no grasping or greed in asking for favours from any one else, so now, when he came to receive benefits from them, he thought it better to leave his own case and that of his brothers entirely in their hands. And when one of the older senators stood up and encouraged him not to be afraid but to speak out, as the senate meant to please him as far as was possible, he still stuck to his point. So after some delay the king retired, and they remained to discuss what should be done. They then resolved to call in Eumenes again, and press him to tell them for what he had come to Rome, since, of course, he himself must know what was best for his affairs and how things stood in Asia. So he was recalled, and this being explained to him, was compelled to make a statement. He opened by saying that as regarded himself he would abide by his former reply, and leave the whole matter to the senate; but there was one point, his relations with the Rhodians, on which he would venture a few remarks. For they were come for no other purpose than he was, both seeking to advance their respective countries and promote their own interests; yet for all that their arguments might produce a false impression upon the senate. This he would briefly explain. The Rhodians would tell them that they came neither to ask anything for themselves nor to detract from the king's claims, but merely to plead for the liberty of the Greeks dwelling in Asia. 'This they will urge not as a favour to themselves, but as your duty and consistent with your former policy. Now this argument, so specious in words, will be found to have in reality a very different effect. For if the cities are liberated, as they propose, it will result in an enormous increase of their power, while mine will be simply ruined. For the name of liberty and autonomy, and the knowledge that this is your policy, will alienate from me all those which have been subject to me, and bring them over to Rhodes. Believing that they owe the Rhodians their liberty, they will in name become their allies, but in fact do whatever the Rhodians bid them. So you will exalt many of those who were hostile to you, and abase me, a true and hereditary friend!'

He proceeded to recount the acts of his father and himself, and their sufferings through their consistent philo-Roman policy. Finally, he declared that if the Romans chose to hold part of Antiochus's former dominion in Asia themselves that would please him best, but if not, no one had so good a claim as he had.

But why not liberate those who were enslaved by Antiochus? If they had not joined him in war against you that might be fair, but now it is surely better to help your friends of long standing than to confer favours upon your enemies but yesterday.

Thus we see King Eumenes struggling against the shibboleth of 'Liberty and Home Rule for all the Greeks.'

Accordingly when the Rhodians entered they commenced by regretting that circumstances compelled them to oppose a very friendly soveran. But yet they must do so, for to them and their country this only appeared worthy of the Romans that every Greek city in Asia should recover its liberty and that autonomy which is precious to every heart. Of course this could not be the policy of Eumenes and his brothers, for a monarchy from its very nature must hate equality, and seek to bring as many cities as possible under its sway. Hence they thought that their mission should have as much weight with the senate as Eumenes's, not from their personal influence being greater, but from their arguments being sounder. If, indeed, it were not possible for the Romans to reward him in any other way than by handing him over the cities which should be autonomous, the Rhodian embassy would feel perplexed, for it would be a dilemma between neglecting a true friend and reversing the whole course of the noble and enlightened Roman policy in the East. 'But if you can satisfy both requirements, where is the difficulty? for, as in a splendid banquet, there is plenty and to spare for everybody. Suppose you give him Pisidia and Lycaonia and Phrygia about the Hellespont, and the Chersonese in Europe, his power would be increased tenfold. [These were either inland provinces, or sea-coast under the influence of Byzantium and Heraclea, and therefore outside the Rhodian confederation.] What object can you Romans have in war? You want no power, for the gods have given you all the world. You want no money, for you have it in abundance, and money is a possession which all can acquire; but honour and the glory of doing what is right is your only possible gain in the matter. Accordingly the most splendid of all your deeds is the freeing of the Greeks,' etc. etc.

The result was of course a compromise. The Rhodians and Eumenes got territory, and the Greek cities already under the king were left to him. Those which had been under Antiochus were made independent.¹

Thus the next fourteen years were a season of great prosperity for both these powers, in spite of their rivalries and conflicting interests.

There was a great change in 167-166 B.C., when the power of Perseus was crushed, and these second-rate kingdoms or leagues were no longer required. Here again we have from Polybius an account of how the Rhodians fared, how the senate resented the attempt at mediation which Q. Marcius Philippus had induced Rhodes to make, and was on the point of destroying this ornament and glory of later Hellenism.¹

¹ Polyb. xxi. 18 sq.

The Roman policy as regards Eumenes was if possible more infamous. He had given the senate no handle for interference. It was only the sure conviction at Rome that every Greek state round the Ægean hated their victory and sympathised with Perseus which set the senate to punish them all, and destroy their power by using the old cry of liberty, and inducing their subjects to revolt from them. Eumenes was patient and prudent, and as his brother Attalus at Rome was loyal to him, and would not accept the suggestions made to him to set up as a rival sovran, this once favoured, now injured, king kept his capital and his crown, and left it to his successor. So then in both these great cities, in spite of the commercial ruin of Rhodes, we may conceive that there was still some intellectual and artistic life, and some leisure to attend to other subjects than party politics. The so-called free cities of Asia Minor for a long time kept their population and their trade, and even after the cruel exactions of the Roman civil wars they recovered their prosperity, and were the ornament of the Roman Empire.

¹ 'For the Rhodians, having learned the answer given them by the senate immediately after the battle of Pydna, and seeing the anger and threats of the senate, sent a fresh embassy under Astymedes and Philophron. When these saw, both publicly and in private, the suspicion and estrangement of the Romans, they fell into the deepest despair. And when one of the consuls, mounting the rostra, was urging the populace to war against the Rhodians, then, being quite beside themselves at the danger of their country, they went so far as to put on mourning, and no longer used arguments or urged their friends, but besought with tears that nothing irreparable should be decreed against their country. After some days, when the tribune Antonius introduced them, and dragged from the rostra the consul who was pressing for war, both envoys made speeches, and having sung their swan's song, as the proverb goes, received such an answer as to free them from their general apprehension of a war, while as to special complaints the senate answered them severely and angrily. The drift of it was this, that but for the interference of a few of their friends at Rome, they knew very well what treatment they thoroughly deserved.'—Polyb. xxx. 4. I shall quote the sequel of the passage in another connection.

CHAPTER XX

DECAYING HELLENISM IN SYRIA—ITS COLLISION WITH JUDAISM

WHILE Greece and Asia Minor were thus engaged in a sort of death-struggle with the domination of Rome, the outlying kingdoms, Syria and Egypt, had for a long time to suffer no more than the interferences of diplomacy, often indeed dictatorial, on the part of the Republic. The series of Syrian and Egyptian kings proceeds as of old. Seleucids and Ptolemies have their accessions and proclamations. If we consult a mere work on chronology, there is no trace to be seen that the glory was departed from them. It is not till the settlement of the East by Pompey and of Egypt by Cæsar that these ancient royal houses are formally swept away.¹ But at the time of the subjugation of the Greek world they had not yet sunk low in their internal splendour and their culture, even though their power in the scale of nations was irrevocably impaired. We have some glimpses of the court and doings of Antiochus Epiphanes which are not without curious interest, and the Alexandria of this period, the home of Aristarchus, has left its literary mark for ever upon the world. To these phases of yet brilliant though waning Hellenism we may now turn our attention.

¹ There were Seleucids, wealthy hereditary princes of the province Comagene, down to the time of Vespasian. Clinton, however (Fasti, iii. 343), will not believe that this was the old royal family.

The kingdom of Syria, from the battle of Magnesia onward, is not only reduced in power but subject to a new influence. The reigning king is obliged to send a prince to Rome as hostage for his own, and still more, his successor's loyalty. Antiochus the Great was obliged to send his eldest son Antiochus to Rome in this way, and it practically ruined this prince's chance of succession, for in those days of slow news, how could he expect to obtain a throne when he could not hear of its vacancy for a month or two, and then could not reach home for a month or two more? Obviously, therefore, the hostage-prince was not the 'heir apparent.' In the present case the younger son, Seleucus Philopator, succeeded and reigned without dispute, and it was considered a generous thing that after eleven years he offered in exchange for his elder brother his own child Demetrius, doubtless to prepare the youth in Roman politics, and to make him Roman friendships. There were plenty of Greeks at Rome to teach him Hellenistic culture, and the society of the greatest nobles and strongest politicians in the world could be found nowhere else. There must have been quite a collection of these royal hostages at Rome, and to judge from what Polybius tells us, they lived a pleasant and luxurious life there, just as exiled princes have been petted and courted in the highest English society of our own day. They sported and caroused with Claudii and Corneli, and if they did not share in the serious studies of their patrician friends, they were probably leaders in all sorts of pleasure. The senate made them allowances in the way of residence and respect, and probably compelled their parents (if they were not liberal of their own accord) to make them a handsome allowance in money, though I can find no evidence on that point. Their households were, of course, made up of Greeks, and probably they seldom took the trouble to learn Latin. Such was the life which Antiochus Epiphanes had lived from the age of thirty to that of forty-five, when he was liberated, and returned home. He must have had for companions not only Romans but many oriental princes—some ordered to Rome as already described, others sent there voluntarily to learn the ways and politics of the senate. This latter education had come to be regarded as a sort of necessity for princes, and no state in the Hellenistic East seems at this time to have neglected it.

Thus Diodorus (p. 518) tells in an interesting chapter on the Hellenistic kings, Ariarathes III., IV., and V. of Cappadocia, that the former (III.), married to a sister of Antiochus II. (Theos), left his kingdom to the next (IV.), a mere youth, and married (192 B.C.) to the daughter of Antiochus the Great, an ambitious princess called Antiochis. Having at first no children, she suborned two sons, but confessed this crime to her husband when she had a real heir. It was then thought best to send away the supposititious sons, for fear of their possible claims upon the throne, the one, 'with suitable appointments' (μετὰ συμμέτρου χρείας), to Rome, the other to Ionia—evidently to the two great centres of politics and of culture.¹ Diodorus goes on to say that the legitimate heir, Ariarathes V. (at first called Mithridates), also got Hellenic training, and turned out not only an excellent prince but a devoted son. When he succeeded (163 B.C.) 'his general culture and his patronage of philosophy were such, that from henceforth Cappadocia, hitherto consistently ignored by the Greeks, became a fit place for educated men to live in.' This was evidently a case of Hellenisation similar to that we have already mentioned as being carried out by Nicomedes of Bithynia, when he founded his capital Nicomedia. But the Cappadocian kings seem to have made the mistake of choosing an inland and inaccessible capital, Mazaca, over one hundred miles from the Black Sea, and still more remote from the Euphrates and the Cilician gates. Mazaca was in fact a mountain fortress in the centre of the kingdom.¹ It is for this reason that the Hellenising of Cappadocia failed to make it a centre of civilisation like Antioch or Nicomedia.

¹ The youth sent to Ionia, apparently to Priene, where he kept his money in bank, was called Orophernes, and afterwards seized the throne of Cappadocia, but was too rapacious and tyrannical to be tolerated in place of the humane and popular Ariarathes V. It is possible that this Orophernes suggested the Holophernes of the romance called the Book of Judith (in the Apocrypha). However, Orophernes was an old name in the royal family of Cappadocia.

No stranger character, however, occupies this period than Antiochus IV. (Epiphanes), and it is very regrettable that we have no account of his life at Rome, for it is hard to conceive so active a mind without some scope to work off its energy. We do not even hear that he spent his leisure in hunting, like the prince who came to relieve him as hostage. But it is hard not to suspect that if there were some young patricians like the Scipios and Æmiliis, there were many more who lived in revelry and in vulgar dissipation, to whom an oriental prince would be a capital boon companion, and possibly an arbiter elegantiarum in the more refined vices of the East.

If Epiphanes spent his life in this way, it did not sap his energy, though it possibly brought upon him that vein of madness which all the historians notice. The catalogue of his acts within a twelve years' reign is very remarkable. He was almost the second founder of Antioch, so greatly did he enlarge and beautify it. He was the first Syrian king who cultivated friendly relations with the Greeks, apart from seeking their alliance (as his father had done) in war. Polybius tells us that when the Achæan League were discussing the propriety of intervention in the quarrel between this king and the Egyptians, it was urged by Lycortas that the friendly acts of Egypt towards Greece were innumerable, whereas this was the first Syrian king with whom they had any intimate relations. But no one doubted his liberality or courtesy. He had sent splendid gifts to the temple of Olympian Zeus at Athens, and had set up statues round the altar at Delphi.

¹ Strabo, xii. 2. There seems no mention anywhere of this Cappadocian capital except here.

His principal wars were with Egypt. Whether it be really true that Eulæus the eunuch, the Egyptian prince's guardian, provoked the war, or that Antiochus was clever enough in diplomacy to have it so believed, the Egyptian claim upon Syria, which Antiochus the Great had taken after the battle of Panion, was renewed, especially as it had since been promised as a dowry to the Syrian princess Cleopatra, now queen-mother in Egypt. The arguments pro and con on this interesting question are given by Polybius,¹ and are very instructive on the international diplomacy of the day. But Antiochus was far more than a match for the Egyptians. He had long since, when a mere youth, taken an active part in the great battle of Panion against the mercenary forces sent into Syria by the king of Egypt. He now won another victory near Gaza, and marched in triumph into Memphis. I need not relate the details of his four campaigns to Egypt, in which he took all the lower country except Alexandria, and this was on the point of falling into his hands when, with the news of Pydna, came the Roman embassy of Popilius Lænas, who commanded him, within his famous circle, to decide on the spot for war or peace with Rome. But for the victory of Pydna neither would the Roman have ventured upon his insolence, nor would Antiochus have ceded his prize. He decided very sensibly. Had there been no Roman army out on war footing, he might have risked offending the senate, for it was not easy to move so large and cumbrous a power as that of Rome, where laziness, and the consciousness of real strength, often led to a policy of carelessness and contempt even for insults. But at this moment a victorious army, raised to its highest efficiency by a stern general, and panting for more plunder, lay ready in Eastern Macedonia; the incoming consul would be eager to pluck his laurels, so it was life or death for Syria. The campaign of C. Manl. Vulso with his army through Asia Minor after the battle of Magnesia showed plainly what would have been the fate of Antioch and its ruler. It is even possible that a Syrian campaign was already arranged, and that the king's submission and personal popularity at Rome precluded this more lucrative expedition.

¹ xxviii. 20.

By submitting at once Antiochus Epiphanes secured his army and elephants, and even the persistent negligence of the Romans, when he raised his forces to an amount distinctly forbidden by the treaty with his father Antiochus the Great. It was on his march to and from Egypt that he passed through Jerusalem, and committed those excesses of which we hear so much from Josephus. But I will postpone for a moment his Jewish policy. On his return to Antioch, he organised at Daphne, by way of rivalry to the pageant of M. Æm. Paullus at Amphipolis, an immense feast, of which Polybius has left us a description.

The king, hearing of the games held by P. Æmilius (at Amphipolis, to celebrate his victory over Perseus), determined to outdo Paullus in splendour, and sent embassies to the cities announcing the festival he would hold at Daphne, so that there was great eagerness among the Greeks to attend it. The opening of the festival was a procession, arranged in this wise. 5000 stalwart men in Roman armour with mail corselets led the way; then 5000 Mysians. Next came 3000 Cilicians, dressed as light-armed troops, with golden crowns, then 3000 Thracians and 5000 Galatæ. 20,000 Macedonians followed, and 5000 with brazen shields, others with silver shields, and then 240 pairs of gladiators. Behind these were 1000 Nisæan steeds and 3000 Syrian, in trappings of gold and silver.

I need not go on with the details of a whole Macedonian army, as Alexander had modelled it—46,000 foot and 5500 horse, winding up with thirty-six elephants.

The rest of the procession is hard to describe, says Polybius, without going into great detail. There were 800 ephebi with golden crowns, 1000 well-fed oxen, 800 elephants' tusks. The number of images could not be told, for of all the gods and demons named or worshipped among men, and besides of heroes, there were statues brought along, some gilded, some dressed in gold-wrought garments, and to all these the myths that belonged to them, according to written tradition, were attached in splendid adornment. (?) Then followed images of Night and Day, of the Earth and of Heaven, of the Dawn and the Noon-day. As to gold and silver ornaments, we may mention that the slaves of Dionysius, one of the Peers and chief Secretary, walked with silver ornaments, each of which weighed 1000 drachms, 600 royal pages came like unto them, and 600 women, sprinkling unguents from golden pitchers, etc. etc. The whole public were also engaged in seeing contests of skill, gladiatorial combats, or hunting in the king's preserves, and fed at tables spread for 1000 or 1500 at a time, and supplied with the most precious unguents of nard, cinnamon, iris, etc. [This taste for dispensing unguents was Antiochus's great hobby.] But he insisted on riding up and down on a cheap pony, ordering the procession himself, so that if you took off his diadem, no one could guess it was the king who was acting the part of a second-rate servant. And at the banquets he arranged the guests himself, and changed them about at table, sitting down and again starting up, drinking healths, standing and joking with the musicians. Nay, as the feasting went on, he was even carried in by the mimes muffled up, and when a tune was struck up, jumped out of his muffling undressed, and danced with the mimes jocular and low dances, so that all the guests got up ashamed and left the banquet, and all that went to the festival wondered, on the one hand, at the splendour and the good appointments and arrangement of the king and his court, but on the other, looking at the man himself and his conduct, how such ability and worthlessness could combine in one and the same human nature.

The historian tells us repeatedly that these mad fits were not the king's usual habit, that he was a man of brilliant talents and high qualities. He was so popular with the Roman aristocracy, and so agreeable to the Roman embassies who went out to inspect his doings, that the senate could never obtain a report against him from their envoys.¹ I fancy him in his splendid capital, a sovran like the ex-Khedive Ismael, unscrupulous and tyrannical, but with large ideas as to the adoption of Western culture, spending enormous sums on the improvement and adornment of his palaces and cities,² oppressing his subjects with taxes, but

¹ Cf. Polyb. xxxi. 5.

² It is curious and melancholy that hardly any traces are now left of the great architecture of the Seleucids. Antiochus IV. added a whole quarter to Antioch, and the descriptions of this and the other great cities of Syria prove clearly enough that the Seleucids delighted in splendid buildings. It is owing to the terrible series of earthquakes which visited Syria for several centuries that all these monuments of Seleucid splendour have disappeared. The only building of this period which still remains in a condition to inform us of its style is the palace of Hyrcanus in the deserts of Judæa, which is referred to below, in the account of his life. Here we see very distinctly Hellenic influences mixed with local Semitic style. We must imagine the architecture of such cities as Antioch much more purely Greek. But the specimen of Jewish showing to visitors from the great kingdoms of Europe such splendid hospitality, that they at least would raise no accusation against him. Such was the account which English travellers gave of the Egypt of twenty years ago. Such, no doubt, was the account circulated privately at Rome among higher circles about Epiphanes—'Leave him alone, he is too mad to do any harm, and Daphne is such a charming place to visit. Let us have an embassy of inquiry every year, but on no account report against him.' His policy was to carry out far more thoroughly than his predecessors had done the Hellenising of his kingdom, and so, in his violence, he overdid the thing, and produced at least one reaction of nationality which has perpetuated its curses of the king, and profoundly modified the history of the East.

The most interesting of all the developments of Hellenism, in many ways, is that which took place in Judæa, because here, as in Egypt, the culture brought in by the Macedonians and planted in Syria came into contact or collision with another civilisation of old standing, of great dignity, and possessing both a literature and a culture distinctly its own. Here too, most fortunately, we have some evidence, not only of the results in religion and in politics, but also in literature, so that we can go into this question with considerable detail. Nevertheless, by a curious coincidence, just as the history of Western Hellenism

Hellenism is deeply interesting and instructive. According to Schürer, the remains of Gerasa, east of the Jordan, are considerable enough to make another exception. There are still one hundred pillars standing there which seem to have belonged to the colonnade of its main street, and which therefore belong distinctly to the type of Antioch and Alexandria. They are said to stand next, among Syrian ruins, to those of Baalbec, Palmyra, and Petra (cf. Schürer, Gesch. des jüd. Volkes, etc., ii. 103).

occupies that gap which our classical education permits between the history of Greece and the history of Rome in Greece, so the history of Jewish Hellenism comes mainly into that gap between the Old and New Testaments which is, by a sort of common consent, omitted from ordinary school teaching. The so-called Apocrypha, which contains most of the evidence, is not printed in our ordinary Bibles. Judas Maccabæus is known to most people as the subject of an oratorio by Händel. There is, therefore, a certain freshness about this period which should commend it to those who are already well versed in the earlier and later history of the Jews. Let me add that though the later part of the literature produced in this epoch is excluded from the Canon, there are two books which belong to the same spirit or school, and which may therefore be put under contribution—Daniel, at least in its Hebrew portions, and Ecclesiastes, which is now generally recognised as the work not of Solomon or his age, but of some philosopher living in the decadence of the nation.

Beginning, however, with the political condition of the Jews, when Alexander the Great arrived in Palestine, we naturally inquire how it was that he treated them with such favour. I lay aside the details of his visit to Jerusalem told with such circumstance by Josephus (Antt. xi. 8, 5), but hold to the fact that from its very foundation Alexandria was the privileged home of a large population of Jews induced to settle there by Alexander's favours.

We are nowhere told why the conqueror favoured this people so exceptionally, but a brief consideration of their antecedent fortunes and character will show such strong reasons in the nature of the thing, that we may venture to supply the answer refused us by antiquity.

From the days of the Captivity (if not even earlier), when great numbers of Jews had been deported by the Chaldæans, and settled all through Mesopotamia and Media, as far as Ragæ (the Caspian Gates), their nationality ceased to be an affair of territory, and became a mere bond of blood and religion, so much so, that while Jerusalem recovered its place and always maintained its dignity as the metropolitan city, scattered portions of the nation, known from early times under the title of diaspora in Greek,¹ became far the most wealthy and numerous. Their position along the great high-road of trade from the far East to Egypt gave them exceptional advantages, and after the refounding of Jerusalem, when they began to send yearly offerings to the temple, their envoys, meeting at the capital, must have established a general understanding as regards trade interests among all the scattered communities of the 'chosen people.' It is easy to see how they would turn their national misfortune into profit. Finding the importance of friends, who spoke a common language, in every foreign city, they opened their eyes to the advantages of this scattered existence, and spread along coasts and islands, perhaps in the wake of the Phœnicians, so that in Alexander's day they were already a widely-known race.

But hitherto their main extension had been eastward, through the cities of the Assyrian and Persian Empire. They had relations of religion and of business with outlying communities as far as the Indian limits of that territory. It was therefore hardly possible that Alexander, who was going to attack the Persian king in a strange country, with no charts, no fixed line of communications, no experienced intelligence corps, should not seize the opportunity of conciliating the only race which was scattered through all the Persian cities, and in constant communication with the sea-board of

¹ In Hebrew Niddach; cf. Deut. xxx. 4, Ps. cxlvii. 2.

Palestine. They could tell him the distances, the size of the towns, the produce and resources, the difficulties of mountains and rivers, and whatever else was necessary to make his campaign an orderly invasion and not a mere knight-errant's adventure. It is more than likely that they offered to serve him as guides, though here again I can find no evidence. But, as we know, the names of guides are seldom recorded, while the intelligence department, which depends upon them, takes all the credit.¹

Thus then the Jews obtained favour, and were invited to form a part of the population of Alexandria, retaining their own customs, ruled by their own officials, and in some respects ranking as citizens of Alexandria, not as a subject race, like the native Egyptians. Alexander had already had experience of them, that they formed communities in other foreign towns, and were, as they now are, good and loyal citizens, while maintaining their distinct nationality and religion. They on the other hand must have understood better than Alexander, the commercial prospects of the new city. This brilliant foundation was closely copied by the Diadochi, so that in Antioch, and we may assume in Seleucia on the Tigris, the Jews were admitted to similar privileges. So satisfactory indeed did they turn out as new citizens of Hellenistic capitals that Antiochus the Gre imported a large body of them to the cities of Asia Minor in order to secure the allegiance of these provinces.

¹ I find a trace of this policy in the statement of Josephus (Ant. xi. 8, 5) when he narrates how Alexander conceded to the high priest at Jerusalem various privileges, among others that of remission of tribute every seventh (Sabbatical) year. 'But when they requested him that he would allow the Jews in Babylon and Media (about whom he must now have heard for the first time) to abide by their national institutions, he readily promised to do what they claimed. And when he said to the people (of the Jews) that if any of them were willing to serve in his expedition, on the condition of abiding by their national customs and living in that way, he was ready to take them with him, many were content to serve as soldiers with him.'

For the first century after Alexander's death Palestine was under the sway of the Ptolemies, and though there were apparently cases of high-handed oppression when the Egyptians visited Jerusalem, the country was on the whole at peace and happy, so much so, that Polybius tells us in the quarrels of Egypt and Syria the Jews were strongly on the side of the Egyptians. It is profoundly to be regretted that Josephus has given us no hint of any sources but one, from which he drew the interesting sketches of the first three Ptolemies in the twelfth book of his Jewish Antiquities. For though the source which he does quote concerning the origin of the Greek version of the Old Testament is manifestly a very bad one—the still extant pseudo-Aristeas—no one who has studied the early history of the Diadochi will fail to appreciate the real knowledge of the early Ptolemies shown throughout Josephus's narrative.

Thus he describes Ptolemy Soter as a rude conqueror, who carried away many captives from all parts of Palestine to Egypt, but nevertheless so far obtaining the confidence of the nation as to make treaties with them and secure their allegiance on the terms accepted by Alexander, and so inducing many to settle voluntarily in Alexandria.

The reign of Philadelphus, on the contrary, is described (after Aristeas) as one of great and continuous favour to the Jews. Apart from the legend of his admiration for their sacred books, and his entertainment of the LXX., he is reported to have liberated all the enslaved Jews throughout Egypt, paying 460 talents at the rate of 120 drachmas per head. This gives us 18,400 as the number of the captives, but the historian adds that the money was obtained even for infants by the owners, who interpreted the king's decree in the broadest way.¹ There seems to be some basis for this story. I note the price of ransom ($1\frac{1}{2}$ minæ) as a liberal allowance in these countries, for on a subsequent occasion² Nicanor and Gorgias, the Syrian generals, offer to sell their captives at ninety for the talent, viz. 66 drachmas apiece, which was intended as a very low price to induce slave-merchants to follow their expedition. The reader will remember that at the siege of Rhodes (above, p. 98) the ransom reached 5 minæ or 500 drachmas. But of course Greek slaves were held in a very different estimation from that of Jews.

I wish we could say something as definite concerning the precious offerings of Philadelphus to the temple at Jerusalem, of which Josephus gives us a detailed description. Either these details were invented by Aristeas's authority,³ or they must have been very early and trustworthy, for the temple treasures were all plundered by Antiochus Epiphanes about 168 B.C., especially the shew-bread table, which is the chief thing described by Josephus. If the account be therefore genuine, it must either have been made at the time of the gift, or it must have been seen among Antiochus's spoils at Antioch. The description (xii. 2, 9) is most minute, and I may observe that while the ornament, all worked in gold and precious stones, contained both Greek and Egyptian patterns—the egg and dart along the edge, the lily or lotus for the legs—there was a careful avoidance of any human or animal forms in all the design. This, which

¹ Antt. xii. 2, 3.

² 2 Macc. viii. 11.

³ The letter of the pseudo-Aristeas, a clumsy forgery intended to magnify the importance of the Jews in Egypt, is extant, but of unknown date and authorship. It has only recently (1868) been critically edited by M. Schmidt in Merx's Archiv, Hefte iii. Earlier editions (Hody, Van Dale, and in Haverkamp's Josephus) were both very inaccurate and very inaccessible.

Josephus does not specially note, seems to imply that the design was really intended for its peculiar place in the Jewish temple.

Whatever may be the truth of all these details, the friendly relations of Egypt and Palestine at that time may be accepted as well attested. And although the kings of Syria had as yet not made good their claims on Palestine, we are told that the first Seleucus, on founding Antioch, had copied the model of Alexandria, and had given the Jewish settlers special privileges, whether equal to those of Macedonians and Greeks, as Josephus says, or inferior, we can hardly say, but real enough to give them the title of citizens of Antioch. Josephus mentions as a curious piece of evidence for his statement that the managers of the gymnasia at Antioch, according to ancient custom, made the Jews a money allowance for oil, as they objected to rub themselves with oil of heathen manufacture.

But the very mention of gymnasia, and Jews practising in them, suggests the topic to which this historical retrospect is the proper introduction. How far had the spirit and the ways of Hellenism succeeded in leavening the Jewish people?

We had seen above (p. 210) that Syria was of all oriental lands the most quickly and thoroughly Hellenised, and this fact could not be without effect on the neighbouring Palestine. A large number of Greek settlements were made through the country,¹ and are constantly alluded to by Josephus, who, moreover, tells us in a story, to be related presently, that those who refused to pay their annual tribute had their land taken from them, and given to colonies of soldiers, sent to occupy it. This then was the retiring pension accorded to faithful mercenaries, and this was the nucleus of the population of many a town. Meanwhile the higher classes were everywhere courting the favour of Lagidæ and Seleucidæ and constantly paying visits to their capitals for political and financial purposes. More especially, when the farming out of the taxes or tribute took place, which seems to have been done by a sort of auction, all the important people of Syria and Palestine, during the period before us, adjourned to Alexandria, and there spent their time intriguing, flattering, bribing, to obtain the favour of the king through his officials. 'Aristeas' mentions, à propos of the LXX., that there was a special officer appointed by the king to acquaint himself with the manners and habits of foreign nations, so that distinguished strangers coming on embassies should have their convenience consulted and their prejudices not violated. They were supplied with the diet they preferred, and were enabled to carry out the practice of their religion. Nothing shows us more clearly than this—surely not invented—detail how completely cosmopolitan was the Hellenism of Alexandria. Further particulars are disclosed in the history or legend of the adventures of Josephus, son of Tobias, related by his namesake in the twelfth book of the Antiquities.

¹ Cf. 2 Macc. vi. 8. τὰς ἀστυγέτονας πόλεις Ἑλληνίδας. This question has been fully discussed in Stark's Gaza, and in the 2d volume of Schürer's Gesch. des jud. Volkes. It appears that these new settlements were not right through the country, but either along the sea-coast (Ptolemais, etc.) or else up the east side of the Jordan (where there was even a Decapolis, or group of ten cities) reaching to Damascus. Of these Gerasa, Scythopolis, etc., may be mentioned. They each had a

He was the nephew of the high priest, Onias II., who was a man of wretched and miserly ideas, and so incensed the Egyptian King, Ptolemy Euergetes I., that he sent an envoy, Athenion, to complain of the want of regularity of senate and assembly of their own, and counted their years by an era of their own, dating from the new foundation. In these cities Jews or Syrians were settled as non-Hellenic citizens, but with some privileges.

the Jewish tribute, and to threaten that he would sequester and colonise their lands. At this moment the young Josephus, who had evidently learned Greek, hurried up from his native village, made himself most agreeable to Athenion, and openly threatened and bullied his uncle for his miserly conduct. The old man was stubborn and would yield nothing, but Josephus pressed him either to go himself to Egypt and deprecate the king's wrath, or to allow some one else to do it, till he got a kind of consent that he should undertake it for his uncle. He then assembled the people, told them he would save them from all the consequences of Onias's stinginess, and got their approval. Having, therefore, thoroughly conciliated the Egyptian envoy, and secured his powerful interest and his promise to introduce him to the king, he sent to his friends at Samaria, then apparently richer and more prosperous than Jerusalem, to borrow the necessary funds for a suitable outfit, and for the journey. On these he spent 20,000 drachmæ (about £700), and meeting on their way to Egypt all the leading men of Syria and Phœnicia, who were going down to the annual auction of the collection of the tribute, he was much despised for the shabbiness of his appointments. But when they all reached Alexandria, they found the king absent at Memphis, and Josephus, while the others awaited his return, started at once up the river, and chanced to meet the king and queen in their chariot with his old friend Athenion in waiting upon them. The latter, since his return, had been continually praising the young Jew, and at once pointed him out to the king, who asked him to come up into the carriage, and began to complain to him of Onias. 'Pardon him,' replied the young man, 'on account of his age. Your majesty must know that old men and infants have the same mental capacities. But all our young men are your faithful subjects, in whom you will find nothing to blame.' The king was so pleased with his smartness as to bring him to Alexandria in his retinue, to the great annoyance of his Syrian travelling companions, who found he had stolen a march upon them.

For when the day of sale arrived, and the joint-tribute of Coele-Syria, Phœnicia, Judæa and Samaria was being estimated at 8000 talents, he broke out upon the bidders, and said they had made a ring to keep down the price and defraud the king; he offered double the money, and said he would collect it, or put up to auction the goods of those who refused to pay. To this the king readily consented, but asked what security Josephus could give, whereupon the adventurer replied, with refined tact, as his namesake thinks, 'I offer most excellent security, which none can gainsay; I offer the king and queen of Egypt as my sureties.' With this sally he succeeded, escaped giving security, and started with a force of 2000 men to enforce obedience, and 500 talents borrowed from the king's household. He was received in Palestine with contempt; but when he had seized and put to death twenty chief men in Ascalon, and sent their property with 1000 talents to the king, and had done the same thing at Scythopolis, his demands were respected, and he established himself as permanent farmer of the Egyptian revenues for twenty-two years, making enormous profits, but spending them liberally on presents to the king and the royal household, so that he always remained in favour.

We may place this story towards the end of Euergetes's reign, when, as I have observed above (p. 325), that king, though not an old man, showed a curious decay in energy, and only appears in the tale as a good-humoured, easy-going sovran, willing to be imposed upon by vigorous and unscrupulous servants. This Josephus was evidently a clever man, but no devout Jew. He was often at Alexandria, and kept large sums there in the hands of an agent, who was a trusty slave of his own. He even got drunk at feasts there, and attempted an amour with a dancing-girl, but was deceived by his brother, who substituted a daughter, so that Josephus had an illegitimate child by his niece—a frequent Greek connection, but abhorrent to Hebrews.

This illegitimate boy, Hyrcanus, was a son worthy of his father, and supplanted all his elder brethren in the affections of the old man. Then came a day when the birth of an heir to the Egyptian crown was announced, and all the magnates of Syria, as of other countries, prepared to send embassies of congratulation. Whereupon Josephus, who was too old to go, asked his sons which of them would undertake this duty. The elder ones declined, 'saying that they were not polished enough in manners to mix in such society,'¹ and advised that Hyrcanus should be sent. He at once assented, and said he would do it economically, only asking 10,000 drachmæ for his expenses, but added, after a pause, that his father ought to give him an order on his banker in Alexandria for money to buy presents for the king in that great mart. The old man considered that about ten talents ought to suffice for this, but, trusting the good sense and economy of his son, gave him an order on his agent Arion in Alexandria, a man who had some 3000 talents of Josephus's money under his hand, and who paid the Syrian tribute at once on the fixed day, without waiting for remittances. Meanwhile Hyrcanus's brethren had sent letters to Alexandria to compass his disgrace and destruction. When he arrived he went to his father's agent Arion, who asked him how much he wanted. He demanded 1000 talents, and when the long-tried and trusty servant sturdily objected and refused to give him more than ten talents, and that for the king's present, adding sundry reproaches that his father's hard-earned money must not be spent in dissipation, the youth forthwith had him put in prison—we may presume by the Jewish authorities in Alexandria, to whom he showed his father's general order. Complaints of this conduct reached Ptolemy, who sent to inquire what it all meant, and why the son of his old friend Josephus had not presented himself at court. Hyrcanus replied that as he would not enter a temple without an offering to the god, he could not appear before his father's benefactor without a gift, and that he had punished his slave by the same right that the king controlled his subjects.

¹ xii. 4, 7.—καὶ πρὸς τὰς τοιαύτας συνουσίας ἀγροικώτερον ἔχειν φησάντων.

So he got the money, and was asked to dine at court, pending the birthday solemnities. There the chamberlains or masters of the ceremonies put him at the foot of the table, or in the lowest place, so that the bones left by other guests were piled up on his table, or before him. The account is here not very clear, and it seems very strange that such a thing should happen to any guest at Ptolemy's table. But I cannot think such a detail invented. The king's jester made a joke about it, and told the king that as Hyrcanus had bared all these bones so his father Josephus had stripped the Syrians. When the king laughed and asked Hyrcanus how all the bones got heaped up before him, he replied that the rest, like dogs, had devoured both meat and bones, while he, being a man, had only eaten the meat and cast away the bones. This answer was applauded by the king, and Hyrcanus's position at court secured. He then ascertained from the household what presents each of them, and the embassies, were going to make, and finding that they ranged from ten to twenty talents in value, outbid them all by buying a hundred boys and a hundred girls for a talent each, and presenting them to the king and queen. When the king asked what he could do for him, he claimed nothing but letters to his father and brethren justifying his conduct. But the king's letters were of no avail, for nothing could reconcile his family to the loss of the money. So, after a pitched battle with his brethren, in which two of them were killed, he retired beyond Jordan, and built himself a splendid rock fortress,¹ where he lived by plundering the Arabs. He committed suicide when the Egyptians lost Syria, and it passed into the hands of the Seleucids.

I have quoted these legends about little-known personages at considerable length, for, however embellished, they show clearly the strong tendency of the upper and the energetic classes to cultivate the Hellenistic courts and their manners. So too we must allow for the influence of the Hellenistic

¹ This fortress is described with some detail by Josephus (xii. 4, 11) in a way which reminds one of the famous rock palace called Les Baux in Provence, between Arles and Marseilles. It has been recently visited and described by Captain Conder (Heth and Moab, p. 163 sq., and Syrian Stone-lore, p. 194 sq.) In addition to the rock-fortress in which Hyrcanus kept his stores and stables, he also built a palace surrounded by a great fosse immediately to the south. 'Here we note three peculiarities. First, the enormous size of the stones, sometimes 8 by 20 feet, the face of the stone being surrounded by a sunken draft like the masonry of Herod's temple, which was probably an imitation of Greek art. Secondly, we note the imitation of Greek art in the details: we have honeysuckles, triglyphs, guttæ, Doric and semi-Corinthian capitals, and moulded door-jambs, evidently copied from Greece. In the third place, we note features peculiar, and apparently of local origin, such as the extraordinary, almost Egyptian-looking capitals of some of the central columns.' 'Here then the luxurious son of Josephus lived in the enjoyment of freedom and fair scenery. Here from his caverns he looked on at the Arab slaves dragging great blocks to the palace rising on its island in the artificial lake. Here perhaps he stored wine of Helbon in his rocky cellars, and beautiful Nabathæan horses were stabled in the rocks above. Here, finally, he fell by his own hand, and the silence of the wilderness descended on the scene of his cruelty and pride' (Conder, loc. cit.)

or Greek cities, as they were called, which were settled all round Palestine and Syria. We find Greek names like Aristobulus and Alexander coming into use, along with the Hebrew, Joseph, John, and Simon,¹ and in both the Maccabees and in Josephus special stress is laid upon the building of a Greek gymnasium in Jerusalem, and the gathering of the young men at the sound of the discus.² They even took artificial means to efface the marks of their nationality, so as to pass for unorthodox when they stripped in the arena. Abroad, their great intelligence and faithfulness to the master they had chosen were strong reasons for their promotion to places of trust and emolument both at the Syrian and the Egyptian courts, and so much did they affect to rank as members of the great Hellenic race that we read in Josephus of complimentary relations with Sparta, in which they genealogise themselves into cousins of the most aristocratic of all Hellenes.

¹ Antt. xii. 5, 1—'Jesus changed his name into Jason, and Onias was called Menelaus.' His brother was Lysimachus. Dositheus and Sosipater, leaders under Judas Maccabæus (2 Macc. xii. 19), may have been mere mercenaries.

² 2 Macc. iv. 8-15—'But when Seleucus was dead, and Antiochus surnamed Epiphanes, came to the throne, Jason, the brother of Onias made underhand attempts to gain the chief priesthood, having promised the king in an interview 360 talents, and from some other source of revenue 60. In addition to these he promised his bond for 150 more, if he were allowed on his own authority to establish a gymnasium and an ephebic system, and to enrol the people of Jerusalem as Antiochenes. But when the king agreed and he obtained the dominion, he forthwith led his fellow-countrymen over to the Hellenic type, and the friendly relations with the court established by John the father of Eupolemus, who had made the embassy concerning friendship and alliance to the Romans, he discarded, and abolishing the lawful constitution, he brought in lawless innovations. For he very gladly established a gymnasium under the very acropolis, and the best of the youths he organised under the petasus (hat of Hermes). And there was such a culmination of Hellenism and growth of denationalisation on account of the extreme impiety of the unholy pseudo-high-priest Jason, that the priests were no longer zealous about the services of the altar, but, despising the temple and neglecting the sacrifices, they were eager to share in the unlawful allowances of the palaestra, attending the summons of the discus; and, holding of no account their ancestral rewards, they valued above all Hellenic distinctions.'

The curious document in Josephus (Antt. xii. 4, 10), thrust in out of its proper connection, is taken from first Maccabees xii., and purports to be a missive from King Areus of Sparta to a high priest Onias. This can hardly be genuine. But it is certainly an early document, and is clear evidence of the desire to establish a heathen relationship. Nor do I think so strange a legend could possibly have arisen without some actual contact or some cause of communication in the very complicated politics of those days.¹ If we examine carefully all the possibilities of the case, we shall find one actual point of contact which may give us a clue to this strange story. It was the constant habit of Spartans, even of the highest rank, to go as mercenaries to Alexandria, where the Jews were a large and important society. It must therefore have been a matter of great convenience to these wandering exiles, often driven from home by revolutions, to find a friendly reception in the Egyptian capital. On the other hand we may be sure that the Jews, though granted many privileges at Alexandria, were not on an equal footing with the Macedonians and Greeks, at least in Hellenistic opinion, and were therefore most anxious to assert for themselves a mythical ancestry akin to the Hellenes. It was under these circumstances that I fancy the missive of Areus, if genuine, was suggested by the Jews and Spartans in Alexandria, where the false genealogy was probably concocted.

¹ This consanguinity is already assumed as quite recognised in 2d Macc. v. 9—καὶ ὁ συχνοὺς τῆς πατρίδος ἀποξενώσας ἐπὶ ξένης ἀπώλετο πρὸς Λακεδαιμονίους ἀναχθεὶς, ὡς διὰ τὴν συγγένειαν τευχόμενος σκέπης. 2d Macc. represents an early source, independent both of 1st Macc. and Josephus. Cf. also the decree of the Pergamenes in Josephus xiv. 10, 22, which concludes: 'Desiring them to remember that our ancestors were friendly to the Jews, even in the days of Abraham, who was the father of all the Hebrews, as we have found it set down in our public records.' The Pergamenes were great manufacturers of pedigrees, seeing that they had no real antiquity of their own. But still this allusion is very strange. The decree is from the days of Ant. Epiphanes.

What evidence have we in Hebrew literature of this strong and dangerous current which threatened to denationalise the people and destroy their religion? Very little indeed, for the representatives of this side, so far as they were orthodox, must have belonged to the Sadducees. Now the Sadducees, though they maintained themselves by foreign influence, and were powerful as aristocrats and men of culture even in later days, were old-fashioned or formal conservatives in religion, and were altogether silenced in literature by the greater energy and success of the democratic movement headed by the Scribes and Pharisees. Their early books and statements of their doctrine are all lost, and there is even considerable doubt as to the amount of their scepticism. There remains only one book of a philosophical character, and this rather the confessions of a doubter, standing aloof from all professed parties, than the manifesto of a sect—the book of Ecclesiastes—in which we may read the intellectual condition of the higher classes during the period before us.

I know how impossible it is to touch any book in the Canon of Scripture without falling among controversialists worse than those who once infested the road from Jerusalem to Jericho. Concerning this very book opinions vary from that of the few remaining enthusiasts who attribute it to Solomon to that of extreme sceptics, who place it in the days of the Herods, and even after the Christian era. The reader must be content to accept from me the mere result of a careful study of the question, which leads me to place it at neither extreme, but some time after the return from the captivity, and before the troubles of Antiochus Epiphanes and the Maccabees. Thus it comes, I think, into the very time when Greek books and ideas were spreading through Syria and Palestine.

We seem to have, as it were, a gradation of books at this period, showing the gradual increase of Hellenistic influences. The book of the Son of Sirach (Ecclesiasticus), the book of the Preacher (Ecclesiastes), and the Wisdom of Solomon indicate three separate stages of this development, whether they be really successive in time, or what is more likely, written by three authors affected by the new fashion in different degrees. But they all most probably belong to this epoch. The earliest in temper and knowledge, for it represents the narrow, self-contented morality of the older Proverbs, without any trace of larger views, is Ecclesiasticus. The author is shrewd and practical, often full of kindness and humanity, and his philosophy is a very sound guide to ordinary people. But there is all through a certain vulgarity and narrowness, which is far removed from the cosmopolitan spirit of Hellenism. It is indeed kindlier than the fierce old Hebrews had once been, but it hardly ever rises to real generosity. I think we may safely say that the author was strictly a Jew of Palestine, who either did not or would not learn foreign wisdom, nay, who probably, like Cato at Rome, thought it a mere mischief.

The book of Wisdom, on the other hand, is written by a man saturated with Greek philosophy, and who, moreover, has made up his mind that Platonism is the creed most in accordance with the Jewish faith. Hence both his thoughts and his language are coloured everywhere by this theory, and much of his eloquence, which is esteemed the greatest among all the apocryphal books, is due to this training. If the work be later than Ecclesiastes, still it most probably dates from the second century B.C.

By far the most interesting, however, of the three, and justly rewarded with a place in the Canon, is the intermediate book, Ecclesiastes. The unknown author, who quotes texts from Solomon and writes in his name, gives us no metaphysic, but rather a practical review of human life from its ethical side, and with special reference to the question of the summum bonum, or true nature of happiness. This in itself suggests that he had come in contact with the Greek philosophy so familiar in Asia Minor and Hellenistic Syria, which discussed this very problem from opposite points of view. It is even asserted, though without any proper accuracy, that the Pharisees and Sadducees in Judæa were based on the Stoics and Epicureans respectively. The points of difference are here more numerous and important than the likenesses. But as regards Ecclesiastes the case is in my opinion far plainer. The book seems to gather opinions from both sides, and so attempt a sort of eclectic philosophy, which is only a mere cento of inconsistent views. After balancing all these theories of life, the writer concludes that practical religion is the only road to happiness—a very reasonable conclusion, though in his case founded not on argument but on mere perplexity.

So vague, however, are his references to all the Hellenistic systems, and so thoroughly Hebrew is the book in other respects, that most professed Hebraists are prepared to deny to it the influence of heathen doctrines, and to expound it as the pure outcome of a Semitic spirit, speculating upon the fortunes of the race, and finding that with the disappearance of idolatry, which is here not even mentioned, scepticism and formalism were the prevailing phases of irreligion. All their positive arguments appear to me sound, but not so their assumption that they have thereby refuted their adversaries. For these too have, I think, shown beyond reasonable doubt that Hellenistic thinking has been a cause of the curious contrast which the work shows to other Hebrew theology. Their case has been recently strengthened by the ingenious book of Professor Pfeiderer on Heraclitus, wherein he shows that, as regards both occasional thoughts and their form in words, Ecclesiastes seems copied, not from the dry tracts of the newer philosophers, but from the mystic, prophetic, semi-poetical utterances of the sage of Ephesus, whose works were now read with interest not only by the Stoics, who took from him sundry theories, but by Oriental thinkers, who found him far more congenial than the dull post-Aristotelian prose. Both sides then may be accepted in this sense, that, as you may often see the child of two completely dissimilar parents showing a strong likeness to each, so that men dispute on the point, and see the father or the mother reproduced in him according to their varying preoccupations, so we have in Ecclesiastes the offspring of a marriage, or at least of a temporary union, between two widely different phases of thought, each showing itself plainly, though, on the whole, the language and nationality of the writer makes his Hellenism the more superficial, his Hebraism the deeper and more determining factor. We may see then in this curious and remarkable document signs not only of the pervading fashion of the day, but also of the deep reaction which was presently to set in, and make Egyptians and Syrians and Parthians into Orientals again, after they had been wellnigh conquered for the civilisation of the West.

We must remember that a national reaction took place in Egypt before it arose in Palestine. The government of Ptolemy Philopator (222-205 B.C.), though that of a debauchee, a man of pleasure, who attended to no serious business, was nevertheless a very oppressive one for his Egyptian subjects. We hear from Athenæus of the extravagant ships which he built, and we know from the circumstances at Alexandria when he died (above, p. 422) that he allowed his mercenaries and mistresses to control all his affairs. The debasing of the coinage in his day, and other financial straits, have been brought out by the recent researches of M. Revillout, and we may be sure that this was the main burden of his oppression.¹ The result was a series of revolutions by the Egyptians, and various demands to obtain in the army and elsewhere a position equal to the Greek and Macedonian soldiers.

The third book of the Maccabees gives us in detail a story of Philopator's attempt to violate the Holy of Holies, after his victory at Raphia (217 B.C.), and his consequent furious persecution of the Jews, who only escaped destruction through a series of miracles. The whole air of the book, and the fact that Josephus tells of similar persecutions by Ptolemy Physcon (Euergetes II.) somewhat later, have led most critics to reject altogether the account in this book of the Maccabees, which is evidently composed as a counterpart to the story of the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, related as an instance of special providence in the second Maccabees. But now that we know the character of Philopator's government through better and more numerous documents, the character and policy ascribed to him in this book correspond so well with our new information, that I hesitate to treat it as a mere fiction, and believe that together with the persecution of the Egyptians, probably for the sake of extortion, there was a persecution of the Jews, who were not only a very wealthy community at Alexandria and through Egypt, but possessed in the temple of Jerusalem one of the richest banks and treasuries then known. If Philopator or his ministers did not make attempts upon this treasure, or raise increased tribute from the Jews under the dominion of Egypt, it would seem the most unaccountable oversight on their part. And so it was that Antiochus the Great was able to conquer Coele-Syria and Palestine at the end of Philopator's reign, and also that the Jews, who had hitherto always sided in their sympathies with Egypt against Syria, thought the change of masters a happy one, and submitted without difficulty to the Lord of Antioch.

¹ Rev. égypt. ii. 115, sq., and on the debasing of the coinage and the new copper standard, iii. 83, sq.

Josephus has given us¹ several interesting documents, or else free renderings of documents, showing how carefully this Antiochus (the Great) considered the susceptibilities of his new subjects, and we hear with surprise that he persuaded 2000 heads of families of the diaspora in Media and Babylonia to transport their families and property into Lydia and Phrygia, then to live as citizens in the cities of Asia Minor, and support the king's interest against the less trustworthy and fickle Greeks. We know that in these new settlements they were no longer called Jews but Ephesians, Laodiceans, etc., and that they were in some senses privileged inhabitants. But let me add how extended must have been the trade relations of the Jews, how well must they have known the conditions of life and of society all through the Hellenistic world, when such an offer was accepted apparently as a favour, and not as an intolerable punishment. This was mainly due, I suppose, to the strong affection of the Jews for their sacred metropolis, and consequent indifference as regards their actual residence, from which they sent yearly embassies with contributions to the temple, and where they deposited the money of widows and orphans for security. No doubt, the scattered and outlying Jews often preserved deeper religious feeling and purer orthodoxy than the magnates of Jerusalem, tempted as these latter were by the almost irresistible attractions of the brilliancy of Alexandrian and Antiochene life. If many of the poor people who sent their contributions from the ends of the earth had known of the gymnasium at Jerusalem, or of the growing dislike to Jewish rites under the shadow of the temple, they would indeed have shuddered with pious horror. But all these things were kept quiet by skilful diplomacy, and the silent Hellenisation of the country, along with the increasing wealth of the temple, lasted through the remaining years of Antiochus the Great, who died when he was just beginning to rob temples for his enormous Roman tribute, and who would certainly have plundered this temple as he attempted with other shrines in his upper provinces. The gentle and weak Seleucus who succeeded did not proceed to any actual violences.¹ But with Antiochus Epiphanes came the day of trouble.

¹ Antt. xii. 3, § 3.—Ewald (Gesch. des Volkes Israel, iii. 2, 329) is disposed to admit the authenticity of the two letters here inserted, in which Antiochus declares his policy of tolerance and generosity to the Jews. To me they seem specimens of the many forgeries made by the Jews in after days, wherewith they supported their claims to privileges and indulgences from later kings and from Rome. Successful forgeries are, however, usually exaggerations of real facts, and not inventions in conflict with them. The policy of Antiochus demanded some such declarations.

¹ 2 Macc. iii. 3 speaks of Seleucus Philopator even contributing, as his father had done, to the sacrifices. This is inconsistent with the account of iv. 7, which represents the beginning of the claims upon the temple treasure as made by his order.

We have the narrative of Josephus, borrowed apparently from the first Maccabees, and a collateral and independent account, that of the second Maccabees, written with a strong moral purpose, to illustrate the providence of God. The so-called third Maccabees, as I have explained just now, is not concerning this crisis at all. But whatever grave doubts there are about the Ptolemy of this latter book, there can be none about the policy of Antiochus (IV.) Epiphanes. He was an extravagant person in many ways, and with many good qualities was upon occasions a violent despot. Even the first Maccabees confesses his strong emotion at the murder of the ex-high priest Onias, seduced from the asylum at Daphne.¹ This good man had ventured himself to Antioch to plead for his nation, and expose the frauds and oppressions of his renegade brother Menelaus, who had him there murdered by one Andronicus. The king had the murderer publicly led in disgrace through Antioch, and executed on the spot where the crime had been committed. Yet when he himself was thwarted he was guilty of both cruelty and injustice. He was, as we know, a violent Hellenist, perhaps the more so because he had found it so much in fashion at Rome, and he was determined to establish Greek habits all through his kingdom. In this he was supported, as far as Judæa was concerned, by the anti-national party, who probably called themselves the party of progress. They bought for themselves (above, p. 480 note) the title of high priest, an office long since given away by either Persian or Egyptian monarch to the greatest favourite or the highest bidder. They undertook to establish gymnasia and ephebic training in the place of the Law of Moses, and they had every prospect of success.

¹ iv. 37.

But when Antiochus was stopped in his last attack on Egypt by the Romans, and was baulked of his greatest prize, Alexandria, which was on the point of falling into his hands, he set out homeward very short of money, and still more of temper, and determined to recoup himself from the immense treasures gathered at the temple of Jerusalem. He ordered Greek sacrifices there, profaned the Holy of Holies, and crushed all opposition with massacre. We are told¹ that he carried off 1800 talents to Antioch, not counting perhaps all the splendid gold ornaments, such as the table and cups given by Ptolemy Philadelphus. Moreover he commenced a systematic persecution of the Jewish religion all through the country, insisting upon Greek altars, Greek sacrifices, and punishing with reckless severity the practice of circumcision and the reading of the Law. Though apparently successful at Jerusalem, he failed signally in the more pious and conservative country parts, where the inhabitants evaded or braved his commands, until the father of Judas Maccabæus, the brave Mattathias, a priest resident in the mountain village of Modeïn, slew the king's envoys and raised the standard of revolt.

It is not my business to go further into the history of the Maccabees. The point of importance to the history of Hellenism is already plain. By violence and cruelty Antiochus Epiphanes stopped the quiet leavening of the Jews, which promised to subdue even their stubborn nationality, and he forced all the enthusiastic spirits into a strong and successful opposition. Semitism or Judæism reasserted itself victoriously against Hellenism, and though the rulers of Judæa down to Herod, nay, even the later Maccabees, were always tending to join the aristocratic or Sadducee party, and thus to show a leaning towards Greek court manners; though the later literature, such as the book of Wisdom, shows strong and manifest traces of Platonic studies; though the language of the country people became so invaded by Greek, that everywhere and in all classes men understood it, and all our gospels, as well as the second and third Maccabees, the book of Wisdom, etc., were composed in that tongue—for all this the reaction in spirit was complete, and, humanly speaking, we may thank Antiochus IV. for having saved for us that peculiar Semitic type which has influenced so strongly the literature and the politics of the Western world.

¹ 2 Macc. v. 21.

The earlier Maccabees were indeed little more than local leaders, rebel chiefs who lived partly as outlaws, partly as national leaders; there was always a large section of the people ready to obey the Syrian monarch, and even to profit by the defeat of the patriots. But after Antiochus IV. there arose no strong monarch, either in Egypt or Syria, who could wholly subdue them. Nay rather both thrones were incessantly subject to the rivalry of various claimants, who were glad to buy the support of any rebellious province by large promises of liberty and amnesty. So the decay of these Hellenistic kingdoms enabled the Jews, and indeed the Egyptians, to maintain their national customs till the Romans came and embodied all in their universal sway. The literature with which this movement was supported was not only the composition of prophecies and visions, in imitation of the old prophets, with special application to current events, but a rehandling of national history with the view of bringing out strongly moral lessons in favour of the Jewish faith and of supplying examples of patriotism. It is likely that some of these books were composed in Greek, and all of them were translated into that language for the benefit of the western and Egyptian Dispersion, which had forgotten the vernacular use of Hebrew or Aramaic. Unfortunately, as is always the case with historians writing for a moral purpose, these nationalists not only saw their facts in a false light, but even went so far as to invent rewards and punishments in accordance with their theory so that we arrive by degrees at historical romances which have little more historical basis than the names of the actors.

Here is a regular series of this kind from sober history to audacious fiction. The first Maccabees is a valuable account of the history of the Jews under the Diadochi down to the reign of Antiochus Sidetes. There is no evidence of any distorting of facts here. But the author of the second Maccabees was evidently not content with this tame account, if he knew it, but rehandles part of the same history¹ with stronger moral and patriotic accentuation, though still on a historical basis, with a few miraculous ornaments, and with documents of a very suspicious character introduced as evidence. The third Maccabees is a patriotic effusion concerning an alleged persecution of the Jews by Ptolemy Philopator, which may be a pure invention, as many of the details most certainly are. But the historical frame is still a real one. Even so much cannot be said of a novel like the book of Judith, which jumbles names and events in a ludicrous manner, making Holophernes, whom we can identify as the Cappadocian Orophernes,² an Assyrian general under Nebuchadnezzar! Yet even here the moral purpose is clear. Through the example of a fair Jewish widow, Judith, the duty of the oppressed people to take vengeance on their foreign oppressors is inculcated. A most remarkable parallel to this development of history as a political sermon has been unearthed by M. Revillout from demotic papyri. There too, under the guise of past history, the duty of rebellion against the Greek foreigners and their rule was enforced by the examples of ancient patriots.¹

¹ This discontent with the vulgar impartiality of real facts may also be seen in 1 Esdras as compared with the canonical Ezra, and in the book of Esther compared with its apocryphal additions.

² Supposed brother of Ariarathes V., cf. above, p. 461.

But these very interesting developments of Semitic literature in Greek dress mostly belong to a period subsequent to Antiochus Epiphanes, when the nation, though still struggling and at times conquered, had gradually asserted its indestructibility. Of the earlier efforts of Hellenistic Jews to make their history and religion known, or to prove its original relation to Greek wisdom and culture, we have only faint traces in the fragments quoted by Eusebius from Alexander Polyhistor. The learned and acute researches of Freudenthal² have shown that as the Egyptians had their Manetho, the Chaldæans their Berosus, and the Romans their Fabius Pictor, all of whom put into Greek dress the antiquities of their respective nations, and brought them before the Hellenistic world, so the Jews had at least one serious annalist, Demetrius the Chronographer, who probably at Alexandria, and in the third century B.C., gathered and published the antiquities of the Jewish nation. His fragments seem free from the often barefaced attempts to magnify the Jewish race at the expense of truth and soberness which appear in other fragments, as well as in such productions as the third book of Maccabees or the Letter of Aristæas. Another important point which Freudenthal makes is this, that those who chose Greek in preference to Aramaic for the vehicle of their teaching were not all sceptical or denationalised, but that there existed, even in Palestine, a party of orthodox Hellenists, who had adopted Greek language and wisdom without laying aside their patriotism.¹ So deeply had the spirit of the age affected even the most stubborn of Semitic races !

¹ Rev. égypt. ii. 1, 2, sq.

² Hellenistische Studien, Breslau, 1875.

Let us dwell upon this development of Hellenistic anti-Hellenism for a few moments. As there was a school of patriots who rehandled, embellished, or invented national history for the moral benefit of their own people, so there was a school of Jewish writers determined to defend the dignity and antiquity of their nation against the ribald attacks now constantly cropping up among the rival claimants for priority of culture. Both Babylonians and Egyptians claimed to be the first originators of philosophy and religion, and such men as Manetho could not pass by the rival claim of the Hebrews and their Moses. Hence he repeated what he calls current stories about the expulsion of the Jews from Egypt on account of a loathsome disease. The whole age was now full of literary dishonesty. Not to speak of historical novels and collections of scandalous anecdotes, the rhetorical objects of writing history were openly preferred to its proper uses, and the desire of pleasing a court with its passing policy was stronger than the ambition to command the permanent respect of the world. Hence, as the Jews were the very first to appreciate the material benefits of the new Hellenism, and occupied much of the trade of the new cities, they excited strong and growing jealousy among their townsmen of oriental birth, and so there were not wanting literary attacks based upon the most scurrilous anecdotes and inventions. It was to meet this attack, dishonest and lying as it generally was, that the Jews took up the same weapons, and in a series of fabricated histories or letters from kings endeavoured to refute their accusers, and turn their own weapons against them. Such are the letters of the so-called Aristeas, from which the legend of the LXX. was derived. Such was the mythical account of Moses and his Egyptian life circulated under the name of Artapanos, and used by various later historians. The accounts of Josephus, where they differ from the Bible in the early history, and some of the documents which he quotes, are attributable to these sources.

¹ Op. cit. p. 127.

This attempt at meeting fraud with fraud was quite a distinct argument from that of the allegorisers—Aristobulus, and afterwards Philo, who desired to explain away difficulties in the early Scriptures rather than to exaggerate them. But no doubt both had their success. It is customary to censure this literary dishonesty in the Hellenistic Jews, as if it had been confined to them, whereas in truth it was perhaps more excusable to adopt it in defence of a serious patriotic cause than for mere rhetorical or literary purposes.

As regards style, Freudenthal, who has written admirably on this subject, remarks that the Hellenistic Jews were one of those societies without a mother tongue which have never attained to any true excellence in literature. Even in Palestine their country was so interlarded with Greek, Arabian, and other settlements, that no unity of language was possible, and beyond its limits they had certainly abandoned the use of Aramaic, while the Greek they learned was the new and artificial idiom of the trading classes over the world. Such a speech had neither traditions nor literature to give it dignity, harmony, nor those precious associations which make depth and poetry of expression the slow growth of centuries in a homogeneous soil.

These qualities were wanting in all newer Hellenism, and this was, indeed, the irreparable want of that age amid all its material splendour. But here is perhaps the best place to insist upon it, because we find this decadence of style in a people of the strongest nationality, with a splendid literature of their own, and even in their later days producing books worthy of the great days of classical Hebrew. The Aramaic parts of Daniel and the Hebrew book of Ecclesiastes are literature of a very high order; among the Greek books and fragments left us from this period there is nothing that does not set the teeth of a good Grecian on edge with its violation of classical form.

Here I pause with regret at the threshold of a deeply interesting intellectual history, which I hope to pursue on another occasion. Let us now turn more particularly to Egypt.

CHAPTER XXI

DECAYING HELLENISM IN EGYPT

It will be well here to resume the scattered notices of the state of Egypt which have been made in the later chapters of this book, in order that the reader may have before him a clear view of the sequence of events. Ptolemy IV. (Philopator) reigned from 222 to 205 B.C., a life of pleasure and vice, drained his finances, alienated his subjects, and left his infant son in presence of a dangerous national revolt, an empty treasury, faithless mercenaries, and ruthless neighbours. The kingdom would probably have been then absorbed by Syria but for the interference of the Romans, who, at the prayer of the Alexandrians, sent a tutor regis in the person of M. Lepidus, and gave Antiochus the Great a still more effective lesson by the battle of Magnesia. Thus Ptolemy V. (Epiphanes), a man of no better character though of far more energy than his father, was enabled to attain his majority without disaster, and hold the reins of government till 180 B.C., when he seems to have been poisoned by some of his household, who heard him joking about his friends' money being practically his own. We must also take note that the great traditions of the dynasty affected even its worst members, and that there were redeeming points in both Philopator and Epiphanes. Of the former Ælian relates that he established a sort of shrine in honour of Homer, where that personage probably received the rights accorded by Greeks to heroes. This at least shows some taste for letters, and respect for the great father of poetry. He also received in the Museum and at his court the Stoic philosopher Sphærus, the pupil of Cleanthes, with whom he apparently lived in familiar intercourse, as appears from the table-talk preserved by Diogenes Laertius (vii. 6). Though philosophers of all schools were very indulgent to the vices of kings, we can hardly imagine a serious and respectable Stoic frequenting the court of a mere debauchee.¹ But with the Lagidæ domestic murders seem part of a family policy not inconsistent with social and literary tastes. Indeed Philometor seems the solitary exception to the rule.

As regards Ptolemy Epiphanes, Polybius specially turns aside (xxii. 3) to tell us that upon the occasion of an alliance between the Achæan League and that king, his ambassador was entertained by Philopœmen, and when mention was made of the king at dinner, the ambassador monopolised the conversation with his many praises of the king, and cited many instances of his hardiness and pluck in hunting, and then of his skill in the management of horses and weapons, and his good training in these accomplishments; he had once, when hunting, killed a bull with a javelin from his horse. When the reader remembers that he had certainly no stirrups, and probably no saddle, this feat is remarkable enough. Polybius adds elsewhere that his minister, Polycrates, prevented him from displaying these qualities in warfare, though he was twenty-five years old, when he dragged the captive insurgents in triumph after his chariot. This king was obliged through his ministers to put down a dangerous national revolt, which lasted through many years of his reign, not to speak of various attempts on the part of his condottieri generals to assume irresponsible powers. But on the whole he seems to have been much more fortunate than his father in securing at least some honest and able ministers, like Aristomenes; and though he put down the national revolt with cruelty and treachery, violating the pardon which was apparently promised to the insurgent chiefs, he on the other hand made considerable concessions to Egyptian feeling in his treatment of the national religion.

¹ It is noticed by Luzac (quoted in Munk, Griech. Lit. Gesch. ii. 506) that a considerable number of Peripatetics in this age spent their time in composing anecdotic Lives, in which they detailed all sorts of fables about famous men, especially of a disgusting and immoral kind. Many of these may have been intended as justifications of the excesses of the Lagidæ—a sort of delicate (?) flattery.

I suppose much of this better policy was due to his queen, the princess Cleopatra of Syria, daughter of Antiochus III. (the Great), and sister of Antiochus IV. (Epiphanes), whose nominal dower of Phœnicia and Palestine was afterwards the cause of renewed wars, but whose personal character and conduct were far superior to those around her. She seems to have had no children for a few years after her marriage (191 B.C.), so that when Ptolemy Epiphanes died, or was poisoned, in 180 B.C., her elder son was not seven years old. She assumed the reins of power as regent till the majority of the prince, fixed in Egypt at fourteen, and seems to have governed with prudence and maintained peace with her neighbours. The Anacleteria or public coronation of the king of Egypt was still an event of world-wide importance, and we hear of embassies from all quarters to congratulate him. But the political centre of gravity had completely changed during the previous reign, and this great ceremony was now but an echo of former days, when Egypt controlled all the policy of Hellenism. How much greater and more serious must have been the meeting of the foreign embassies at Rome in 189 B.C. to congratulate the western republic on the victory of Magnesia! From thenceforth it was to Rome that every eye turned, and to Rome that they trusted for the settlement of their disputes.

When the prudent queen-mother died, shortly after the majority of her son, the war with Antiochus Epiphanes for the possession of Palestine soon supervened. This was a war which brought all the misfortunes upon the Jews. The young king was at once defeated and taken prisoner, and it was now perhaps that occurred that curious passage in his life when his eunuch-tutor Eulaeus advised him to take a large sum of money and settle at Samothrace.¹ It was the energy of the younger prince, afterwards joint king with his brother, then King of Cyrene, and in the end his brother's successor (as Euergetes II.), which upheld the national cause in Alexandria, and so far delayed Antiochus's conquest that the two princes, by turns opponents and allies, were able to hold out till the battle of Pydna had left the Romans free to interfere with emphasis, and save Egypt for a time.

But from this time onward, when Antiochus IV. died on his return to Antioch (167 B.C.), the thrones of Antioch and Alexandria were constantly disputed by rival claimants, partly owing to accident, partly to the infamous diplomacy of the Romans, who took care to keep intestine quarrels alive, in order to weaken their eastern allied kingdoms. This is particularly clear in the case of the two Ptolemies, Philometor and Physcon (Euergetes II.), who were perpetually sending rival embassies to Rome, and yet either failed to obtain or were able to thwart any decision of senate. On the whole, however, Philometor was successful ; he actually subdued, and might have put to death, his brother in Cyprus, but showed his mother's justice, or perhaps rather gentleness, in sparing him and giving him back his royalty. We may be quite certain that Physcon, like all other Ptolemies of this period, would not have spared his generous brother for a day. The princesses too of this and the next generation are not more confused in name—they are now almost all Cleopatras,¹ even when sisters of the same house—than they are indistinct in character.

¹ Polyb. xxviii. 21.

Philometor is called the last good Ptolemy. The Jews afterwards boasted that he had been in particularly close relation to their nation. He had had teachers and public servants from among them, and knew of their religion and their literature. This at all events is historical, that Onias, son of a high priest of the same name, who was a refugee in Egypt, finding no doubt that by the transfer of Judæa to the kingdom of Syria the Egyptian Jews had been much cut off from their intercourse with Jerusalem, finding also that they attempted various irregular cults throughout Egypt, perhaps most of all wishing to make them a separate and independent religious community, applied to Philometor and his queen to allow him to occupy a ruined temple at Bubastis, and an enclosure overgrown with shrubs and full of sacred animals. He proposed to build here, on the exact model of the Jewish temple, a sacred edifice, to be dedicated to Jehovah, and served by Jewish priests and Levites, adding that the king and queen and their children should also be honoured there, doubtless as θεοὶ συννάοι, or companion gods, according to a usual fashion in Egypt.

¹ The famous name Cleopatra only came into the royal family of Egypt with the Syrian princess just mentioned. Previous queens had been called either Arsinoe or Berenike.

Josephus, who tells us the story (xiii. 3), puts an answer into Philometor's mouth, conceding the site, but wondering how such a new foundation could be in harmony with the Jewish religion. The argument in reply was founded on a prophecy of Isaiah, foretelling that there should be an altar to the Lord built in Egypt (Is. xix. 19). This was the foundation of the temple of Leontopolis, near Heliopolis, which lasted till the year 70 A.D., but which never attained any real importance for the Jewish nation.

The fact is here of peculiar importance, as showing how far the Jews were ready to accommodate themselves to Egyptian Hellenism; for this very king was in the habit of rededicating temples to Greek deities, or rather to Egyptian deities rebaptized (if I may venture the expression) under Greek names. Of this several inscriptions give us information. Josephus adds a story of the formal controversy held before Philometor and his peers between the Samaritan and Judæan Jews as to the respective claims of the temples on Mount Gerizim and Mount Sion to orthodoxy and respect. When the historian adds that the defeated advocates were to suffer death, and that they were executed by Philometor, he evidently tells a falsehood, and throws discredit upon the whole story. But if anything would rehabilitate its credibility, it is his summary of the arguments used by the victorious Jerusalemites—first proving the long succession from father to son of high priests, and secondly how all the kings of Asia had honoured the temple with splendid offerings. Such arguments were excellent before Philometor and his friends, but they go very little way to prove the question proposed by the historian for the argument, viz. to show which temple had been built according to the laws of Moses. The whole chapter in Josephus, however embellished it may be, gives us a true picture of the king, agreeing with the stray notices of Polybius, Diodorus, and Athenæus, so that for our purpose we may set it down as valuable tradition. We must not forget to add that Polybius, our highest authority, qualifies his very favourable account of this king's justice and mercy to his wicked brother and all his subjects by adding that when in prosperity a certain Egyptian dissoluteness and idleness came upon him, which brought him into many difficulties.¹

It was nevertheless a real loss to Egypt that Philometor was killed (146 B.C.) in an attempt to take the kingdom of Syria from one claimant and give it to another. He won his battle, but was thrown from his horse and dangerously wounded, so that he was carried into his camp insensible. They attempted trepanning his skull, but he only revived sufficiently to have the great satisfaction, as Josephus puts it, of seeing the head of his enemy. His wicked brother immediately laid siege to Alexandria, and the widowed queen of Philometor had no alternative but to submit to marrying him, and seeing her infant son, the legitimate heir (Ptolemy Eupator), murdered on the day of her second marriage.

This seventh Ptolemy, who reigned for many years (145-129), and who was the last undisturbed king of Egypt, though he had himself contested his brother's crown for twenty years, was a remarkable person, both in appearance and character, and we may fitly close our history of Hellenism in Egypt with some account of the country as Roman visitors saw it in that day. Indeed, Scipio Æmilianus, on one of his state visits to the subject or allied states, brought with him the Stoic Panætius, who wrote an account of this more than royal progress. It is a great pity we have no more of his description of the court of Physcon than a couple of extracts in Athenæus. For the struggles and broken successions of the thrones of Syria and Egypt, the claims of Demetrius, of Alexander Bala, of Tryphon, of Antiochus Sidetes, and those of Physcon's various children, legitimate and illegitimate, may be studied in Clinton's chronology, but give us no further insight into the spirit of the age. What we must rather endeavour to reach through the veil of anecdote and fable and misconstrued facts is the literary and social condition of Alexandria in the days of the last Ptolemies.

• ¹ xxxix. 18.

The death of Ptolemy VI., Philometor, brings us to the limit in date set for this book, but it may be well to include in our general view the court of his successor, Physcon (or Euergetes II.), certainly one of the most remarkable sovereigns in the series of Ptolemies. He led a stormy and uncertain life from early youth, first in conflict with Antiochus IV., then colleague and presently rival to his brother, presently King of Cyprus, long ruler of discontented Cyrene, a frequent suppliant at Rome, cajoled and balked in turn by Roman diplomacy, conquered and forgiven—probably the sorest thing of all—by his generous brother. So he at last forced his way to the throne with the murder of the proper heir, embittered against his old subjects at Cyrene, embittered still more against Alexandria, and determined to have his revenge. He let loose the mercenaries upon the populace, and a few years afterwards, having enraged the people into revolt by his horrible treatment of his wife Cleopatra, whose younger son Memphitis, his own heir, he had murdered and then sent to his mother as a birthday present, he repeated the same outrages at Alexandria in repressing this second rebellion. Nevertheless he was all smiles and courtesy when the embassy, headed by Scipio Æmilianus and accompanied by Panætius, came from Rome to inquire into his conduct. Owing to his luxurious life he had grown enormously fat, and wore a long loose garment reaching to the feet, with long sleeves down to his wrists ; his politeness to Scipio, to whom he showed all his wealth and appointments, compelled him to accompany the Roman on foot, which was quite contrary to his habit, as he usually required the support of two people to move. Nevertheless, we are told that at his supper parties he could join vigorously in the dances with which these feasts were disgraced. It was probably, I think, the influence of this Roman embassy which made him spare Marsyas, the general of Cleopatra's rebellion, and even reconcile himself with this queen, whose feelings we can hardly understand, seeing that no cruelty or insult towards her had been omitted by Physcon. I suppose that when the divine right of kings is so thoroughly acknowledged as it then was in Egypt all the laws of human morality cease to be applied to them.

But though his reconciliation with his wretched divorced queen seems to have been effected, it was not so with the Greek population of Alexandria, who had been the principal agents in the opposition. All our scanty notices agree that his massacres and confiscations not only cleared this great city of the preponderance of Greeks, but drove into exile most of the learned men of the Museum, and when the king, threatened, as I suppose, by Scipio, issued edicts of amnesty and invitations for these people to return, they refused to do so. We are told, in fact, that the persecution of Physcon filled Greece, Asia Minor, and the Isles with crowds of learned men, who brought there the wisdom and learning of Alexandria. These accounts remind us of the effects produced by Herod's persecution of the early Christian Church, or by the Turkish conquest of Constantinople. Persecution produced a wide diffusion of higher knowledge.

More curious and more interesting is the statement that the Greek population and the savants refused to return which implies that from henceforth the Hellenistic character of this great city was seriously impaired. As to the fact we have it vouched for by the indisputable authority of Polybius, who visited Alexandria after the double catastrophe. Polybius, says our meagre excerpt,¹ having been in the city speaks with horror of its then condition, and says that three races or kinds of people inhabit the city—the Egyptian or native race, clever and orderly; secondly, the mercenary class, large, unruly and troublesome, for from long habit the court supported an army of mercenaries, who had learned rather to rule than to obey through the worthlessness of the kings. The third was the race of the Alexandrians, not very orderly either, owing to the same causes, but still better than the former, for though of mixed blood yet they were of old Greek origin, and inherited the common traditions of the Greeks. But as this population had disappeared principally through Euergetes Physcon's fault (during whose reign Polybius visited Alexandria)—for Physcon being revolted against repeatedly let his soldiers loose upon the populace and massacred it—such being the composition of the inhabitants, the poet's word indeed remained true: 'to visit Egypt is a long journey and distressing.' It does not appear that either Polybius or his friend Scipio thought of penetrating to the ancient splendours of the country; Scipio went only as far as Memphis (close to the present Cairo) and studied chiefly the richness of the soil, the dense population, and the remarkable defensibility of the country. Polybius, with all his general culture, probably never went beyond Canopus, and neither of them thought of visiting the splendours of the now forgotten and half-deserted Thebes.

But why did the long-settled Greeks of Alexandria no

¹ xxxiv. 14.

² Diod. Sic. pp. 629, 630.

return to their city? The victims of earthquakes and volcanoes are no sooner exhumed and the houses cleared than the population returns and settles again upon the threatening site. Why did the fury of the king produce a greater and more lasting effect? Only because it coincided with permanent and growing causes, just as a sudden plague permanently depopulates a decaying country, whereas a strong nation recovers the shock and fills up its ranks. The centre of gravity of Hellenism was changing rapidly from the East to Rome. Many enterprising Alexandrians must have been thinking of moving thither when they were decided by the disturbances. Moreover the Hellenistic states now under the control of Rome were secure from violence and bloodshed. The Romans had not yet displayed their ruthless commercial rapacity, and were still great peace-makers throughout the world.¹ These causes may have determined the mercantile classes. The literary men, on the other hand, who had gradually made their university no mere home for learning and research but a training place for young men, must have felt that the Alexandria of those days was the worst possible place for such a purpose. Who would venture to send his son into the luxurious and dissolute capital, when Tarsus, Rhodes, Athens offered the safe retreat of a quiet university town, whose main object was now the education of well-bred youths?

Thus the furies of Physcon undid what he strove to accomplish in keeping Alexandria a great literary and scientific centre. The king himself was an author, and wrote memoirs from which several very interesting things are quoted by Athenæus. He had been the pupil of no less a man than the famous Aristarchus, the prince of ancient critics, in whose day that recension of ancient texts was accomplished which has preserved them to our days in comparative purity.¹

¹ Cf. the passage quoted from 1 Macc., above, p. 442.

The name of Aristarchus reminds me that the reader will here expect some account of the literary and scientific condition of Alexandria under the later Ptolemies up to the period of the dispersion just mentioned, which is placed about the year 135 B.C.

The complexion of Alexandrian studies had indeed considerably changed. Alexandrian poetry, if we except short and slight pieces such as epigrams, was going out of fashion. Men had collected the texts of the great masters, and found it far more interesting and profitable to criticise and explain them than to attempt to rival them. Moreover the Greek tongue was rapidly degenerating by constant Oriental and Egyptian use, so that the Museum found itself obliged, far more urgently than the French Academy, to determine and, if possible, to maintain a classical language as opposed to local and corrupt idioms. The day had arrived when grammatical criticism was really a science of the last importance, and when its greatest master justly earned a splendid reputation.

It is strange to think how all these great labours might never have been suspected, though they affect all our classical texts, but for the survival of one MS. of Homer with the Greek notes or scholia which were selected in after days from the commentaries of the Alexandrians. Even in this book we have only the Iliad, and in almost every disputed reading only the final decision of Aristarchus, his predecessors being seldom quoted except for refutation. But we know that the critical school began with Zenodotus, continued with Aristophanes of Byzantium, both acute men who did a great deal for the history of the older Greek poetry, and reached its summit with Aristarchus, the tutor of Ptolemy Philometor, as well as of Physcon, and flourishing in Philometor and Physcon's reigns. Two opponents of his, the Separatist school at Alexandria, who urged the contrasts between the Iliad and Odyssey, and the Pergamene school, who perceived the many exceptions to strict analogy (anomalies) in human speech, helped to bring out his talents for controversy, but also the weaker sides of his character. It is to his strongly conservative instincts that we owe more than can be acknowledged in the preservation of Homer. He was exceedingly cautious and careful, sparing of hypotheses, and deciding by parallel cases and from a comparison of the uses of words all through the poems. But we may suspect that after he had become a literary dictator, and found that his word was law, he tampered with the evidence before him to establish favourite theories, such as the Attic origin of Homer, and the single authorship of the two great epics. This is not the place to go further into Aristarchus's labours.¹ Unrivalled as were the resources of the Museum and library for these studies, both the greatest masters felt Alexandria so uncongenial that Aristophanes strove to escape in old age to Syria, and Aristarchus ended his life in Cyprus. The particular circumstances are not preserved to us in either case.

¹ I think I may say this when we compare the good mediæval MSS., derived from the traditions and copies of the Museum, with the disgracefully bad fragments of early date—almost from Ptolemaic times—found on papyri in Egypt. Such Egyptian texts as the Bankes fragment of the Iliad, or the passages from Euripides lately found, show what Greek books were becoming in the hands of local scribes.

¹ The curious student may consult the special works of Lehrs and A. Ludwig, and indeed a host of others, and may see a résumé of what they have established in the Homeric chapters of my Hist. of Gk. Class. Literature.

Turning to the Alexandrian exact science of this epoch, we do not indeed find names so brilliant as those of earlier Alexandria, which have still left us Euclid on geometry, Apollonius on conic sections, Archimedes on statics, and Eratosthenes on scientific geography.¹ But from the later days we can cite Hero and Philo, who treated of dynamics, chiefly in reference to projectiles and the engines used in war. From the same generation comes the great astronomer Hipparchus, the one man who combined careful observation with speculation, and to whom we owe the first closer determination of the length of the solar year (he made it $365^{\circ} 5' 55.12''$) and the first attempt at a catalogue of stars. With these discoveries he proposed to reform the geography of Eratosthenes as regards latitudes and longitudes. These leading names, to which many more might be added, show that the scientific position of Alexandria was still splendid. We may assert the like of its medical school, which is said to have enriched all Hellenism and Rome by an influx of its physicians when the dispersion under Physcon took place.

But if the scientific side of the Museum, including classical criticism, was very brilliant, much cannot be said for its literature. New poetry was checked, as I have said, by the proper appreciation of the great masters and the dread of the critics' ridicule; but in prose, though the production was enormous in quantity, the quality was very poor. In addition to the prime and inexplicable fact—the decay of literary genius—we may assign as a cause of this decadence the enormous materials brought together in Alexandria, which gave so vast a field for exposition and commentary that men felt there was no time for polishing their style. We must remember that through its very founder the Peripatetic school had coloured all the pursuits of the Museum—the Peripatetic school with its encyclopædic tastes, its contempt of literary form, its passion for details. These lesser points in the great Aristotle were imitated by his followers, and so the whole literary prose of Alexandria becomes a wilderness of collections—generally of small details, without any appreciation of their relative importance. No doubt a great deal of gold was to be found scattered through the chaff, as we may see from Plutarch, Diodorus, Diogenes Laertius, and others, who, from these biographical and historical dictionaries, culled geographical and zoological facts, curious natural phenomena, fabulous accounts of distant lands, of signal virtues and more signal vices, catalogues of ancient myths and usages, general histories of the world in chronicle. But in all this forest of detail there was no large theory, no fruitful principle.

¹ Even learned classical writers are seldom aware of the quantity of Greek mathematical tracts extant, and which I only characterise here quite generally, referring to Mr. Gow's Hist. of Alexandrian Mathematics for a learned and accurate account.

Such was the condition of Alexandrian philosophy and history. Rhetoric had never flourished there, partly from having no practical field under a despotic government, partly from the contempt in which it was held by later Greek philosophers. The only living and fruitful system of philosophy—Stoicism—never made itself a home at Alexandria, though individual Stoics were invited there and flattered with every courtesy.

Thus, to sum up this whole review of Alexandria, the positive aspects of knowledge had completely ousted the metaphysical, as Comte would say, in its poetry, its philosophy, its faith. No doubt the Alexandrian dons thought this a great advance upon their forefathers. To understand poetry accurately, to analyse the laws of its production, to gather facts and be content to wait for their explanation, to chronicle events and refrain from connecting them by theory—all this seemed wiser and more advanced than the dreams of Plato and the enthusiasm of Pindar. But erudition, however respectable, is not genius, and moreover it is repulsive to the world at large, while genius possesses an eternal charm. Nor will any intelligent age permit itself to be defrauded of its high privilege to speculate upon the origin of things and the destinies of the world.

So it happened that a combination of causes, of which the decay of speculative philosophy and the dispersion of the Greek population are the most certain, made room for the ambitious efforts of the Jews to have their religion and philosophy accepted by the Hellenistic world. No doubt Aristophanes and Aristarchus looked upon their earlier productions with horror. Greek grammar, as conceived by the critical school, was defined as the practical knowledge of the use of the classical authors, and this use was violated in every sentence of the LXX.

But when the learned of the Museum were obliged to flee from the massacres of Ptolemy Physcon, there remained room for the lesser learning of the Jews, which hitherto had occupied an obscure and not very respectable position. What they suffered in the troubles of the times seems to me very difficult to ascertain. It is stated quite definitely by Josephus (against Apion, ii. 5) that they only escaped by a miracle from massacre by Physcon, seeing that they had taken the side of Queen Cleopatra against him in the revolt. Why, then, does he make no mention of this prominent event in his Antiquities, especially when he speaks with strong reprobation of the foundation of the Egyptian temple by Onias, the very person whose opposition to Physcon brought about the great persecution? Josephus is so fond of providential retributions that it seems strange he should pass over so suitable a case for his favourite moral reflections. But the facts of the threatened massacre, the preparing of the elephants by intoxication, and the miraculous interference, with many other fabulous additions, are attributed by the third Maccabees to the reign of Philopator some seventy years earlier.

How is it, too, that if the Jews were so prominent in the insurrection against Physcon, no notice of them is taken by Polybius in describing the Alexandrians? Does he ignore them altogether, or class them among the Greeks, or among the natives? That he had studied their peculiarities, and therefore did not write in ignorance, appears from another passage (xvi. 39). The true solution seems to be that he classed them among the natives. For whatever Josephus may say, when he strives to make out (against Apion, 2, § 4) that they were Alexandrians in the sense that Macedonian and Greek settlers were, it is certain that if this were so, Polybius here and in his account of the riot on the accession of Epiphanes¹ would have mentioned them. Their privileges, therefore, must have been mainly exemptions on the ground of their religion, which indeed is the only point mentioned in the stories of the favour of Alexander the Great.² This conclusion I find supported on other grounds by T. Mommsen in his new volume,³ where he shows that it was easy to confuse the various privileged classes with one another, on account of their common points of contrast to the native populace. I think there was also deliberate falsification, and that this was one of the many attempts of the Jews to improve their prestige with the Romans, and so gain further advantages.¹

¹ Above, p. 422.

² Cf. above, p. 468.

³ Röm. Gesch. v. 491, note.

But this may be set down as certain, that with the decay of the purer Hellenism of Alexandria, the Jewish Hellenism assumed a more aristocratic position, and the Jews stood out in contrast to the despised and unprivileged natives. With the decay, too, of Greek speculation and of Greek faith, came the just hope that it might be replaced by religion and philosophy of old Hebrew growth. So it is that we find this very epoch producing the first attempts to show that Greek and Hebrew wisdom had a common origin, to show that old Greek poets and Hebrew prophets walked by the same light, and were the apostles of the same great truths. A beginning was made by means of literary frauds and strained interpretations. Sibylline oracles were forged, lines interpolated,² and texts of Scripture accommodated. But presently there was called in aid the fashion of allegorising, which had made some progress in Greek theology, and the too material or too Semitic features in the Old Testament were softened and reduced by this means.

The principal name in this stage of the fusion is Aristobulus, who is called by the Jews a tutor of Ptolemy Philometor, and who wrote a Commentary on the Mosaic Law, of which fragments are quoted by Clemens and

¹ Strange to say, Schürer, in his admirable Gesch. des jüd. Volkes, etc. (ii. 533), accepts the dictum of Josephus, and believes that in all the Syrian and even Asianic cities the Jews were settled with the same rights as the Macedonians and Greeks. I think this impossible to reconcile with Polybius, our best and most unprejudiced witness.

² Thus, in proof of Homer's knowledge of the Sabbath, the line Od. 5, 262 was read, ἑβδομον ἡμᾶρ ἔην καὶ τῷ τετέλεστο ἅπαντα, and a passage on the unity of God was composed for Sophocles (Clement, Strom. 5, 14).

Eusebius. In this book the personal and quasi-human acts and feelings of Jehovah were all explained away as allegories. The often striking coincidences between Mosaic and Hellenic wisdom were not yet accounted for by a common inspiration, or original unity of divine truth, but by old contact of learned Greeks with Palestine, or the spread of forgotten translations of Moses. It was not till far later, under the early Roman empire, that Philo attempted that philosophical fusion of Semitic and Hellenic thought which developed into the mystic doctrines of neo-Platonism. Perhaps we may make a solitary exception of the remarkable Wisdom of Solomon, probably written at this time,¹ and which gives the Semite wisdom of Solomon in a form strongly coloured by both Platonic and Stoic thought. This is perhaps the highest and noblest expression of earlier Alexandrian Judaism. But it can hardly be called the most characteristic. I think it very noteworthy that the historical novel with a serious moral purpose was now the favourite form of Jewish literature, and one which was not only very rare in Greek literature but was not adopted by the Alexandrians. This feature in the early Greek Jewish books came to them from the Hebrew books of the period, which were at first translated into Greek before men used the new tongue freely enough to compose in it. A whole series of books, beginning perhaps with Esther and Daniel, but certainly including the list already given,² treat the former history of the Jews with such freedom as to be almost fictions, while using historical names, preserving historical characters, and all illustrating the providence and protection of Jehovah extended to those of His chosen people who were steadfast to His law. This very serious use of fiction, for I can hardly think that the authors can have been unconscious of their inventions and transferences of facts, as an adaptation of history to moral and patriotic purposes, became a leading fashion in the Christian Church, but was quite foreign to Hellenistic ideas. We have indeed, in the Cyropædia of Xenophon, a romance intended as a treatise on education, but I cannot find any such tendency in the later prose fiction. The prose tales of Alexandria were either love stories, such as I have already discussed, or tales of wonder and adventure, such as the romances about Alexander, which were at this very time growing up in Egypt. In all these there is no more serious motive than to astonish and to amuse. Here then we have Semitic seriousness, an earnest feeling for patriotism and nationality, contrasted with the frivolity of Hellenism.

¹ Cf. Bissell, Comm. on the Apocrypha, pp. 224-228, in Lange's Comm. on Script.

² Above, p. 483.

Thus we note a decrease in the purity and intensity of Alexandrian Hellenism at the very time that Rome was attracting the learning and acuteness of the Greeks. After Aristarchus there was no great master at the Museum; the only literature which flourished in the succeeding generations was the epigram. How far philosophers and men of letters were now gathering to Rome will appear when we come to follow Hellenism to its new home, or new exile, in the capital of Italy.

It would be very interesting to know how the Greek population of Antioch fared during this literary decay of Alexandria. From some points of view it must have been gaining ground in Hellenism. Antiochus the Great brought back from his campaign in Greece a large number of Eubœans, Bœotians, and other pure Greeks, to swell the population of his capital, and it is probable that he began that great enlargement of the city which was continued and completed with great splendour by his son Epiphanes. The Hellenistic fervours of this prince have already been discussed. But after his death the constant wars of succession, and rapid rise and fall of kings in the later Seleucid history, account sufficiently for the decay of political importance in the great Syrian city, even apart from the dominance of Western politics. This too is certain, that if the Jews increased in importance in Alexandria, they must have done so still more in Antioch, since the rise of the Maccabees had made Judæa independent, and given her rulers the title of king. The later Maccabee sovrans, Alexander and Aristobulus, were quite powerful enough to make their race respected among the people of Antioch. We may therefore assume an intensifying of Jewish influence, and so far a decay of Hellenism even in Antioch, though unfortunately we have no Antiochene literature to give us any light upon the subject. Syrian Hellenism had never been dominant in letters. We only hear a stray philosopher called a native of Apamea or Seleucia on the Tigris. But from this time onward till the days of Christianity the great cities on the Orontes and the Nile, though populous and busy as ever, cease to be political centres, and to sway the fortunes or the ideas of the world. In contrast to this decaying and colourless condition, we have the strong individuality of the Jews making itself felt, and further off the mass of the Eastern Semites, under the Aryan but oriental Parthians, as well as the southern Egyptians, reasserting their spiritual life and showing those indelible characteristics which had been covered with a varnish of Greek letters and laws. But though the original grain thus reappears as the varnish wears off, it never resumes its old surface.

In the case of Antioch, another terrible enemy began at this very time to show its hideous force. In the year 148 B.C. occurred the first of that great series of earthquakes, which in ten several visitations, reaching over seven centuries, at last accomplished the complete ruin of the city in the end of the sixth century A.D. The poor attempts to revive it in mediæval and modern times have met with a similar fate; for we hear of earthquakes in 1115 and again in 1822, crushing what remained of human industry.¹ This is the reason why the city of the Orontes can show no ruins like Baalbec and Palmyra, whose splendid temples and colonnades were once as nothing compared to the foundation of Seleucus.

¹ Cf. K. O. Müller, Antiqq. Antioch, § 5.

CHAPTER XXII

POLYBIUS AND HIS AGE

IT remains for us now to take stock of all the various accounts we have kept with various branches of Hellenism, and form a general estimate of the state of the eastern Mediterranean lands when they fell under the power of Rome. For from this time until the further pacification produced by the empire, and more especially the reforms then carried out in the administration of the provinces, a complete intellectual and social lethargy pervades the states which had so long been the most brilliant centres of culture. There is nothing to record after the death of Polybius but the occasional passage of Roman armies through Greece, the fierce requisitions made upon the cities of Asia Minor, their retaliation by the massacres of the Mithridatic war, and the terrible devastations occasioned by the great campaigns and battles among the rival claimants for the sovereignty of Rome. Pharsalia, Philippi, Actium, were all Roman civil conflicts fought on Greek soil. No literature or art flourished amid the political apathy and the military agitations of this doleful epoch.

We close then with the fall of Corinth, and the subjugation tion of Greece by Mummius, and we are here fortunate in being able to interrogate the most competent witness perhaps of antiquity on the general condition of the world, concerning the changes made by the Roman conquest of the East both in the realms of Hellenism and within the conquering city itself. Polybius was a man of important family, brought up in the most aristocratic society of the Achæan League, trained to politics by his father and the other leading Achæan politicians, and to arms in the school of Philopœmen. He lived in the midst of the complicated wars and diplomacies from the opening of the second century to the end of his country's independence. He was, moreover, not only exiled with the 1000 Achæans, and so compelled to live for years in Italy, but by the fortunate accident of some literary correspondence with P. Æmilius, was made the inmate of that great man's house, and became the intimate of the celebrated Scipio Æmilianus. He saw the destruction of Carthage and of Corinth; he visited Alexandria after the furies of Physcon, and he lived long enough, after all the crisis was over, to compose in the leisure of old age, and amid the gratitude and affection of those around him, the great history of which we have some books, many excerpts and many fragments, but of which we deplore the now lacerated condition. The extracts which appear all through this volume will have shown the reader what precious materials he has preserved for us, and what a mine of knowledge has been lost with the disappearance of the larger portion of his forty books. For it was perhaps the greatest universal history, or history of all the civilised world, ever attempted in old times.

I intend in the present chapter to gather from his work those additional indications of life and manners for which I could not find a convenient place in my previous narrative, and so bring into a general view many interesting but isolated details. But these will not be estimated at their proper value unless we give some further account of the mind and temper of Polybius, his philosophy of religion and of life, his theories of morals and of laws, and his consequent qualifications as a witness over so large and various a field. For this purpose we can only consult a single source, the remains of his history which are still preserved to us.

As we might expect from the man's good birth, his familiarity with the best people in Greece, and his long intimacy in the houses of the greatest nobles in the world, there is an aristocratic tone about him which constantly pierces through his accounts of the democratic patriots that led the last despairing struggle against Rome. For example, Chæron of Sparta (xxiv. 7), who had been on an embassy to Rome about 204 B.C., and who returned to do great mischief by socialist agitation in his city (ὀχλαγωγῶν), is described as 'a man of sharp wits and a talent for politics, but a low young fellow with the education of the common people.'¹ Again, when describing one of those late meetings of the League at Corinth, where mad resolutions were passed against Rome, he explains it by saying 'that a crowd of working people and artisans were assembled such as never had met before; for all the Achæan cities at that time were drivelling (ἐκορύζων), and most of all the whole population of Corinth.' These various remarks confirm completely what Mr. Freeman has long since shown, that the temper and working of the Achæan League had been essentially timocratic, and by consequence aristocratic, so that a leading man like Polybius felt himself distinctly one of the higher classes, as opposed to the masses.

¹ ἄνθρωπος ἀγχίνους μὲν καὶ πρακτικός, νέος δὲ καὶ ταπεινὸς καὶ δημοτικῆς ἀγωγῆς τετευχώς.

The policy of the League in his day was more one of diplomacy than of force. The wisdom and ingenuity of his party was rather directed to mediation and compromise than to carrying out a strong foreign programme ; accordingly we find in him a marked taste for diplomacy as such, for arguing international questions on the basis of previous treaties and acknowledged rights, so that he has left us on these questions more materials than any other ancient historian. But for all that his military training had not been neglected. He seems to have been more a theorist than a practical man, and to have had a greater taste for cavalry than infantry service ;¹ but his large knowledge enabled him to give us the only full and reliable account of the Roman military system—its various services, its camps, its discipline in war, and its tactics in battle. He even takes credit for the invention of a better system of fire signals, substituting the great principle of indicating the letters of each word by a signal, and so spelling out a message, for the older plan of signifying facts by varying numbers of lights. He thus anticipated the principle of the modern heliograph, if we substitute fire lights visible at night for sun flashes.² Nevertheless, though the vanity of the Greeks afterwards led them to assert that Scipio Æmilianus's victories were won by Polybius's advice and direction, there is no evidence that he was reputed a great practical general.

¹ See his curious chapter on cavalry drill, x. 23.

² Perceiving that the messages to be conveyed are far too complex to be represented by any ideographic system, he tells us that the only serviceable plan is to spell out the message, and accordingly, dividing the alphabet of twenty required letters into four groups of five, he proposes to indicate first the group by so many successive flashes starting from the left, and then the letter of this group by flashes starting from the right, so that a system of five flashes set in a horizontal line, and never showing more than one at a time, will answer all purposes. He describes a very ingenious earlier system of one Æneas, and says that he himself had worked out the details of the new system first suggested by Cleoxenus and Democleitus.—Cf. x. 43-47.

Let us rather turn to his many declarations on religion and philosophy—for philosophy was now a religion—and see what this shrewd and experienced practical politician had set up as his rule in life. In many places he shows his strong love and reverence for truth, though many men and cities may have prospered by far different principles. Thus in commenting on the career of Philip's admiral Heraclides, the ruffian who had set up altars to lawlessness and impiety (xviii. 54) when he harried the Ægean islands, he says: 'Nature, it seems to me, makes it plain to mankind that truth is the highest divinity, and assigns to her the highest powers. For though all men try to overcome her, and all that is plausible is allied with falsehood, she, of her own power, insinuates herself, I know not how, into the hearts of men, and sometimes forthwith manifests her authority, sometimes again, after being a long time obscured, finally prevails through her own force and overcomes falsehood, as happened in the present case.'¹

This feeling for truth is strongly allied to the belief in a moral government of the world, a government made manifest to all by the punishment of those who have committed crimes and have escaped the ordinary justice of men. Then he describes in pathetic language the horror and the gloom which beset the closing years of King Philip V. 'For fortune, as if desirous to exact punishment from him in due season for all the impiety and lawlessness of his life, then set round him (as it were) the furies and the avengers of those who had endured misery at his hands, which, never leaving him night or day, took from him such terrible satisfaction, up to the day of his death, as made all the world

¹ xiii. 5.

acknowledge the proverbial eye of justice, which no man can afford to despise.¹ And he goes on to prove his case by quoting details of the family tragedy in which the father put his favourite son to death, and then discovered that he had been duped by the survivor.

As regards the lesser vices of men he declares himself principally against meanness, and that in two forms, want of ambition or self-respect, especially in rulers, and parsimony in money matters. He inveighs against a Ptolemy, apparently Philometor, when opposed to Antiochus Epiphanes, for yielding even temporarily to the advice of his tutor, and consenting to retire with ample treasure to Samothrace, instead of taking upon him the cares and dignities of a great sovereignty. He derides and reviles King Perseus all through his career for miserable parsimony. He is quite amusing on the diplomacy which went on between Perseus and Eumenes II. of Pergamum, who 'ran a dead heat' in stinginess,² and digresses to show how it ruined all Perseus's policy by marring all his higher interests. He calls it the peg to hang every baseness upon. It is the shabbiness of states and princes in his own day, when compared with their splendid liberality to Rhodes after the great earthquake, which persuades him of the decay of Hellenism.

I may relieve these graver cases by the amusing story he tells of an Ætolian miser called Alexander, who was sent with others on an embassy to Rome just after the battle of Magnesia (190 B.C.), but was seized on the way by the Epirotes, then at war with the Ætolians. 'It happened that this Alexander was the richest man in Greece, and the other ambassadors not so, but far inferior to him in wealth. And at first the Epirotes demanded a ransom of five talents from each. This seemed rather hard on the others, but yet they were willing to give in, as they thought their own safety the main thing to secure; but Alexander refused, as the sum seemed to him monstrous, and he spent sleepless nights lamenting over himself if he must really pay five talents. Meanwhile the Epirotes, foreseeing that the Romans might hear of it and order them to let free the ambassadors, came down to three talents, which they demanded from each. The rest jumped at this offer and departed, having given security for the money, but Alexander said he would not give more than one talent, for that even this was a great deal, and so at last despairing of himself he remained in captivity, an elderly man with a fortune of more than 200 talents.' We see by this that £50,000 was still an immense private fortune in Greece. 'It seems to me that he would have surrendered his life rather than the three talents. But chance rewarded his parsimony, so that he even gained praise and approval from all for his absurdity, for a few days later there came an order from Rome to release him, and he alone got off without any ransom at all.'¹

¹ xxiii. 10.

² ἱερὸν ποιήσαντες τὸν στέφανον τῆς φιλαργυρίας, xxix. 8.

Such being Polybius's views on practical morals, what was his higher philosophy? Evidently of the Stoic type, as appears both from his ideas and his language. And this accounts for the combination of advanced scepticism as regards the religion of the day with a deep sense of divine providence, and of one God ruling the world. He is indeed never tired of telling us that man, apparently the most inventive and clever of animals, is really one of the stupidest; for hundreds of cities have been taken by treachery and by the violation of fair promises, yet still you will find new cities and other men, who, though they knew all this, will trust the same promises and rush into the same snare.²

¹ xxi. 26.

² xviii. 40.

Yet he expresses his astonishment, in the case of Prusias,¹ how the same man can at one moment pray and supplicate at the altars of the gods, 'falling on his knees and behaving like a woman,'² and at another ravage and plunder the shrines of these very gods in an enemy's country.

It is probably this contempt for the mass of mankind which gives a Machiavelian complexion to much of his political philosophy. He tells us that systematic villainy is more readily condoned than exceptional and unexpected wickedness, and in this way accounts for the high position of the Ætolian League; but his ideal state is one where religion has been established and is observed, not because it is true, but because its sanctions affect the masses who require some restraint beyond that of reason and justice. Here is a remarkable passage,³ which I quote because it surely represents the attitude of many thoughtful men in the period before us. 'The exceptional point in favour of the Roman state is its attitude towards the gods; and it seems to me that what others blame in that people [no doubt Hellenistic sneers] really sustains Roman affairs, I mean their superstition; for this point has been so paraded by them, and introduced both into private life and public affairs, as to leave no possibility of going any further. It may seem wonderful to many, but I think the Romans did so for the sake of the mob. For if it were possible to collect a whole society of wise men, this kind of thing would perhaps not be necessary, but when every multitude is treacherous and full of lawless desires, irrational impulses and violent passion, nothing remains but to control it by mysterious fears and scenic effects. Wherefore the ancients appear to me to have introduced their notions of the gods and their views of Hades among the populace not at random or in any chance way, nay rather men nowadays try to expel them at random and without good sense. The result is—to specify one point—that public men among the Greeks, if they be trusted with but one talent, though you take ten copies of the deed and affix ten seals and have twenty witnesses, cannot keep their trust, whereas among the Romans, though handling great sums in their offices and embassies, men hold to their duty under the simple bond of an oath. Elsewhere it is hard to find a man keeping his hands off public money, and pure in this respect; at Rome it is hard to find a man guilty of such conduct.’

¹ xxxii. 27.² γονυπετῶν καὶ γυναικιζόμενος.³ vi. 56.

Let me quote one more passage¹ on this political view of religion. Speaking of a statue at Iasos in Asia Minor, which, though uncovered, was alleged by certain historians as well as by common local tradition never to be wet with rain or snow, he adds: ‘But I somehow find myself all through my history opposing with impatience such assertions of historians. For it seems to me that to state what is not only beyond the limits of reasonable speculation but even of possibility shows an altogether childish frame of mind. To say then that some bodies placed in sunlight cast no shade is the assertion of a stagnant (ἀπηλγγκυίας) mind, which Theopompus has actually done, when he says that people who enter the sacred enclosure of Zeus in Arcadia become shadowless. What I have just mentioned is another case of it. So far then as it tends to preserve the spirit of religion in the masses, we must excuse some of the historians who tell fables and wonders of this kind; but whatever is in excess of this, must be censured. Of course the exact limit in each case is hard to define, but yet this is by no means impossible.’

As regards the general politics of Polybius, his large

¹ xvi. 12.

experience told him that all resistance, except by way of diplomacy, to the Roman power was absurd; he moreover undertook to justify this dominion as the inevitable result of that providence or fortune—the two are with him nearly identical—which rules the affairs of men. This providence was justified by the superior moral character and public spirit of the Romans when they set out upon the conquest of the world, and though, when that conquest was completed, the internal virtues of Rome became rapidly depraved into vices, it was then an accomplished fact, and must be submitted to as the decree of fate. His general views on states and statescraft are given in a famous passage¹ in which he modifies the doctrines of Plato, but in general agrees with the view that all human constitutions are of terminable growth, and naturally prone to decay by reason of the abuse of power common to all men. Whenever any individual or section of the community gains power, and finds restraints removed, and when the memory of the earlier condition becomes faint, such governing sections abuse their power and deprave their state so as to bring about either their own destruction, or its reversal to another type. Thus in his own day, though he does not here illustrate it in this way, the moderate democracies were degenerating into cheirocracies, being ruled by mob violence, while the monarchies were passing, or had passed, into tyrannies. He goes on to show that as Sparta had been sustained for centuries by the theoretical genius of Lycurgus, who had so balanced the monarchical, aristocratical, and democratical elements as to afford mutual checks and safeguards, so by the operation of practical good sense the Romans had accomplished a similar result, and for that reason had conquered the world. He foresaw, indeed, in the distance the decay of Rome also.

¹ vi. 3.

The corruption which came rushing in with the conquest of the East did not escape his ken. But for the present he justifies the domination Rome had attained by the natural course of events, by that divine providence which men call fortune, and so he preaches political resignation to the Hellenistic world.

But this is combined with a strong taste for diplomacy in lesser matters, and for the urging of constitutional points in seeking to limit the threatening despotism of new, and somewhat coarse, masters. Hence the evident delight he takes in reproducing this kind of discussion, of which we shall presently produce some examples.

As for the old feeling of city patriotism, such as we know it in men like Epaminondas or Demosthenes, Polybius regards it as mere stupid bigotry. He turns aside specially to censure Demosthenes's random use of the word traitor for anybody who did not subordinate all other interests to that of the autonomy of the orator's city, and shows that many sensible politicians in that day had been justified by expediency in siding with Macedon—the Arcadians, for example, had liberated themselves from the domination of a nearer and more oppressive neighbour, Sparta—while the policy of Demosthenes only failed to bring ruin upon Athens owing to the mercy of the conqueror. It is a question, he says, of degree, and of motive, not of principle, whether we should side with a foreign power against a section of our own citizens.¹ He does not cite Phocion, but he evidently thinks such a man the right man in the right place. So far removed were now the wisest and noblest men from the splendours of Hellenic patriotism!

¹ It is more than likely that he found this argument very fully stated in the Memoirs of Aratus, by way of justifying the surrender of the Achæan League to Antigonos Doseon.

As regards his literary qualifications, we can judge them not only from his own work but from his copious criticism of other historians. It was an age of conscious and captious writing. Everybody was surrounded by literary observers, and praised or censured in accordance with all kinds of standards, social, political, and philosophic. In a very instructive passage,¹ in which he criticises at great length the Rhodian historians Zeno and Antisthenes, he divides historians into those who write for pay, meaning, no doubt, the many pamphleteers who wrote for kings and commonwealths whatever was suited to the politics or the vanity of the patrons; those who wrote from the rhetorical point of view; and those who really wrote as political thinkers, and for the profit of mankind. He is quite ready to acknowledge the value and the attraction of rhetorical splendour, though, as I have already said, he is so far removed from the real masters of Greek history, that he seems perfectly ignorant of the merits of Herodotus and Thucydides, perhaps even of Demosthenes, for he quotes Demetrius Phalereus as the acme of all perfection. But while admiring rhetoric so highly, and, no doubt, appreciating his own style far above its merits, he perceives that rhetorical descriptions are apt to disguise or pervert the truth, and in descriptions of battles especially, to hide the real truth altogether. Such were the current accounts of the battles of Issus by Ephorus and Callisthenes,² and of the battle of Panion¹ by Zeno in the passage now before us.

¹ xvi. 14, sq.

² xii. 17.—He shows here that the alleged numbers of the Persian army were such as could not possibly fit into the plain of Issus north of the river Pinarus. It may be added that the feeding of such enormous multitudes as Greek vanity alleged to have marched against Alexander would be plainly impossible even with our roads and railways. All the numbers set down in ancient accounts of battles are thoroughly untrustworthy, especially the numbers of the slain, which the historians deliberately magnified on patriotic grounds.

But the mistakes of Zeno, a serious and honourable historian, were due to other causes also. Apart from his weakness for rhetorical display, he did not study the geography of his narrative, and he was inclined to distort facts to increase the glory and hide the defeats of his native city, Rhodes. Polybius is very tender to this sin of over-patriotism, but thinks Zeno should have drawn the line before describing a defeat as a victory, when the official despatch from the admiral was still extant in the archives of the Prytaneum at Rhodes. As regards Zeno's geographical errors, in which he describes Nabis going from Sparta by Sellasia to Messene,—which is like going from Corinth by the Isthmus to Mycenæ,²—he thought it proper to write to Zeno, and point out the mistake. Zeno received the criticism with good temper, at which Polybius seems to have been somewhat agreeably surprised, but as the book was published there was no remedy. Polybius himself invites his readers to send him similar corrections, whenever he may have made mistakes, owing to the length and complexity of his subject. He also draws a careful distinction between clerical errors, or mistakes of the copyists, and real errors in the author's knowledge.

A similar proof of the self-conscious and critical temper of the times is afforded by his note on the alternation of the first and third person in his own narrative.³ 'You must not wonder if we designate ourselves at times by our proper name, at others by the use of the plural, viz. "when

¹ Near the sources of the Jordan, in which Antiochus the Great defeated the Egyptian forces under Scopas the Ætolian, 198 B.C.

² Note his own false use of points of the compass here—he speaks of Mycenæ as west of Corinth, and the isthmus as east.

³ xxxvii. 4.

Polybius said this," and again, "when we had arranged." For as we were much implicated in the events that are about to be narrated, it was necessary to vary our own designation, lest we should either offend by the tautology of always repeating the same name, or by constantly using I and we become offensive, but rather by judicious variations escape, as far as possible, the fault of talking about ourselves, since such writing is naturally unpleasing, though it is often unavoidable in explaining what happened. And so far chance has helped us in this matter that up to our day nobody, so far as we know, ever inherited my name.' When he became celebrated, and statues were raised to him by grateful cities in Peloponnesus, many people were called after him. But the passage before us shows how full of self-consciousness the man was, and what criticism he expected. 'This is also plain from his own unsparing censure of earlier authors, such as Timæus, whom he ridicules for being a pedant in his study, and reading books when he should have been studying men and things. We shall revert to this controversial side hereafter.

Such was the atmosphere in which this great man lived. We have elsewhere spoken of his love for sport, and his contempt for special bodily training, other than that for strictly military purposes. The Olympic games were still popular and crowded, but from the scene there which he has described¹ it appears that boxing was now the chief sport, and that the old national feelings of the spectators were giving way to a mere admiration of professional display. 'Cleitomachus,' he says, 'was the most famous athlete in all Greece, and all the world knew of him, when King Ptolemy [we know not which], desirous to pull down his fame, took all pains to have a new boxer trained and sent to Olympia to compete with him. The coming contest excited great interest, and all the crowd favoured the new man, Aristonicus, for his pluck, and for the chance of seeing the champion beaten ; so that when the fight began and seemed even, and presently Aristonicus got in an effective blow, the whole crowd shouted applause. Then they say that Cleitomachus, standing back to recover breath, turned to the crowd and asked them what they meant by encouraging Aristonicus, and backing him as much as they could. Was it that they did not think he himself was fighting fair, or that they did not know that he was fighting for the glory of Greece, but Aristonicus for that of King Ptolemy? Would they prefer an Egyptian to carry off the Olympic prize from the Greeks, or a Theban and Boeotian to be proclaimed victor? Whereupon there was so sudden a reversal in public sentiment that Aristonicus was vanquished more by the crowd than by Cleitomachus.' I suspect this amounted to positive interference with the combatants.

¹ xxvii. 9.

The reader may be surprised that I devote so much space to the character and opinions of Polybius, when my concern is with the age which he describes. But there is no better way of attaining a general conception of the epoch than by studying its reflection in the writings of a man who was in many senses the mirror of his age. There are, of course, some limitations to be carefully observed. In the first place, if he was below the teaching of the highest philosophers in his Machiavelian contempt for the human race, and in his preaching of expediency as the only true motive in politics, he must, on the other hand, have been far above the average of that or any other society in intellect. As regards his circumstances also, it is impossible that a man enjoying the extraordinary privileges which he did in the house of Paullus Æmilius and his great adopted son, should not have felt himself bound to magnify Roman virtue generally, and the Scipionic virtues especially, beyond their actual merits. He tells us indeed that his history would be chiefly read by Romans, and we cannot but suspect that he accommodated himself to that public. The acts of Scipio Africanus, as described by him, must have been drawn to some extent from family traditions, which he heard from elder friends and relations of his pupil. These things make one suspect this house-dog of the Scipios of having been utilised, half unconsciously perhaps, on his part, to exalt the glories and maintain the popularity of a great and ambitious house.

But enough of these detractions from our great and only eye-witness to the condition of that brilliant age. Let us leave Polybius himself and endeavour to draw from his work, and from the later historians, a picture of the condition of decaying Hellenism, before we pursue it to Rome, and there see it in its new and strange habitation.

Perhaps the greatest source of the decay of Hellenism was the almost sudden depopulation of Greece itself, the real home and centre from whence everything great in Greek Asia and Egypt was confessedly derived. Let us hear Polybius upon this subject.¹ 'I, who censure those that refer their public deeds and private misfortunes to fate or chance, now desire to apply the same principles to historical criticism. Where it is impossible or very hard for human knowledge to discover the causes, a man may perhaps in his perplexity have recourse to the Deity or to fortune, such as to explain a sudden excess of rain and waterfloods, or else of drought or frost, bringing with them failure of crops. Such are also frequent epidemics, and other things of which we can give no account. It is natural then that in such cases we should fall in with the notions of the public in our perplexity, offering sacrifices and prayers to appease the Deity, and sending to ask the gods by what words or acts we might improve our condition and obtain some relief from pressing ills. But where it is possible to discover the cause which produced the result, I do not think we should refer such things to the Deity. Here is an example. In our own times all Greece suffers from childlessness and general want of population, through which both cities have become deserted and cultivation of land has ceased, although neither protracted wars nor visitations of pestilence have afflicted us. Now should any one propose to ask the advice of the gods by what course we might increase and populate our cities, would he not appear silly when the cause is manifest and the remedy lies in our own hands? For men have turned to ostentation and to love of money and selfishness, so that either they will not marry, or if they do, will not support the children they have beyond one or at most two, whom they can provide for richly and bring up in idle luxury—and so the mischief has quickly grown upon us ere we observed it. For when there are only one or two children in the house, if war or disease carry one of them off, houses must come to be left desolate, and like hives of bees, cities of men must fail. About this then there is no need to consult the gods; any common man can tell us that we can best of all find the remedy in ourselves, by repenting of this love of riches, and if that is not done, by making laws that children must be brought up [by their parents?]. There is no need of prophets or visions here.'

¹ xxxvii. 9.

This is a new reason added to those which I have stated long ago for the depopulation of Greece. The mercenaries brought back quantities of money, as the Spaniards did from America to Spain. Luxury increased, and with it both the style of living and the prices went up. Industry, however, and the power of producing from the soil diminished with the disappearance of the best part of the working population. So the money which had been brought in went out again for luxuries, and left the many poor, while their artificial wants increased. The few who were thrifty or had capital became very rich, and then there was the usual cry that the world was unfairly divided. There were, in consequence, the attempts at plunder by new land laws, or by excessive taxing, which are often proposed in our own day by the Socialists; and as one kind of immorality seldom prevails without another, those who wished to plunder their richer neighbours or who hugged their own wealth also forgot their duties to the commonwealth, and refused the trouble and expense of bringing up children. I said above (p. 120) that the crime of exposing infants, though not considered such by Greek laws, and used as a frequent device in theatrical plots, was not, in my opinion, really common. At this later day, when Greece was prostrate and dying, the evidence of Polybius is too clear to be gainsaid. The same kind of immorality prevails, as we know, in France, perhaps too in American cities, and in London; but medical practice and modern sentiment have contrived to avoid the scandal of exposing infants, and the same end is attained by interfering with nature in other ways. The moral causes in both societies are the same—the desire to enjoy the pleasures without the responsibilities of life, and the dislike of toil and thrift as involving nothing but misery.

I must add to this catalogue of vices another disgusting feature of the times—cruelty. I do not now mean the ruthless plundering and murdering and selling into slavery which we see practised by the Romans, and which was regarded as terribly harsh and cruel, though, of course, fair, by the Greeks. It is rather the deliberate infliction of torture, frequently to extract evidence, but oftener by way of punishing one's adversaries. Not only the wild democrats of the Achæan League, such as Diæus¹ and Critolaus, tortured their political opponents, but the aristocratic Aratus had not scrupled to do it ; and we may say that no free man was now, as he once had been, practically safe from torture, even in constitutional societies. We must remember that a slave-owning society is never very far from this horrible vice. Disregard of the human chattel, and the dangerous position of the dominant minority, have always made masters liable to use torture. We even find at free Athens, in her most civilised days, that in every moment of great panic the public were ready to apply it to free men to extract evidence.² But now that absolute monarchy had again reappeared as a recognised form of government, in which the sovrän had unlimited power over his subjects, the men of once free cities must soon have become accustomed to these horrors ; and whenever any revolution brought a politician into absolute power, he was imitating not the loathed Greek tyrant, but the splendid king of Egypt or Syria, when he allowed himself to question or punish by these violences. Hence we see in the consolations offered by the philosophies of the day the possibility of torture generally put forward with the boast that even this will not destroy the happiness of the man who has 'found peace.'

This it is which makes the Stoic system always justify suicide as the wise man's escape from greater ills, and no reflection is more frequent in Polybius. High treason being always punished with torture, Molon and Alexander, the insurgent satraps of Antiochus the Great, committed suicide to avoid this fate; and when the principle was once acknowledged, it was obvious that the certainty of disgrace would be avoided in the same way. For to honourable men the agony of shame is less endurable than physical torments. Thus King Perseus was censured for not avoiding by voluntary death his disgrace at the Roman triumph, and his humane conqueror even hinted this to him very broadly.

¹ Cf. the shocking cases, xxxix. 11 ; also torture at Rhodes, no doubt in a public panic at the Roman threats, xxx. 8 ; so Polybius says that Hermeias lost his life without at all paying for his misdeeds (v. 56). This and the sentence on Achæus were cited above (p. 397). But these last cases were in Syrian society.

² Cf. my Social Life in Greece, Index, sub voc. 'Torture.'

It is à propos of this very crisis that Polybius gives us his views clearly on this subject.¹ When the Romans made their terrible inquisition throughout the Hellenistic world after their victory (168 B.C.), there were three classes of partisans of Perseus threatened with vengeance: those who silently sympathised but had refrained from act or word against Rome, like the Achæan patriots; those who had attempted to drag their fellow-citizens into the war without success; and those who had actually done so. The Molossian leaders were among the last; they met their fate bravely, and died fighting when their executioners came upon them. The Achæans, on the other hand, very properly challenged a fair trial, and cheated all the expectations of their foes; for it is no less ignoble to commit suicide when you are conscious of no crime or baseness, through fear of the threats of political opponents or of kings, than it is to love life beyond what is meet.²

¹ xxx. 6 sq.

² τοῦ παρὰ τὸ καθήκον φιλοζῶειν. The Spartan king Cleomenes (Plut. Cleom. sub fin.) is represented as drawing a similar distinction, and repudiating suicide as cowardice if there be the least hope of yet doing service to one's country. This, therefore, is not quite the extreme theory 'that the wise man should walk out of his house if the chimney smokes,' which we find in Epictetus, and in some of the Roman nobles mentioned by the younger Pliny.

The remaining case was that of some citizens of Cos and Rhodes, upon which the historian dilates, not to gloat over their misfortunes, but to show the absurdity of such conduct, and afford a warning to others in similar circumstances.

These men, especially Polyaratus and Deinon of Rhodes, made speeches and wrote letters trying to excite their own and other states to help Perseus, so that not only were many of their fellow-citizens privy to their views, but their correspondence with Perseus was found in his papers and made known, and their emissaries made prisoners by the Romans. 'Yet they could not make up their minds to put themselves out of the way, but still hesitated, so that, holding out for some prospect of life against desperate chances, they sacrificed what reputation they had for boldness and daring, and sacrificed all claim to pity with posterity. For being convicted downright by their own handwriting and their agents they appeared rather shameless than unfortunate. Thoas, a sea merchant, the go-between of Deinon and Perseus, who saw what was coming, fled to Cnidos, and thence was taken by the Rhodians under extradition, and when questioned by torture corroborated every word found in the captive documents; and yet Deinon endured to live till this exhibition of him was made. Polyaratus behaved even worse. For when Popilius directed King Ptolemy to send him to Rome, the king, out of respect for Rhodes and for Polyaratus, thought it right to send him home, adding an account of the circumstances. He, therefore, entrusted him in a special ship to Demetrius, one of his household. But when they touched at Phaselis on the way, Polyaratus escaped to land, and sat as a suppliant at the public hearth of the city. If any one had asked him what he meant by this, I am persuaded he would have had no answer to make. For if he wanted to be brought home, that was the very thing being done for him ; but if to Rome, that was going to happen in spite of him. What other alternative was there? For there was no other place that could receive him with safety. But when the Phaselitans sent to Rhodes and told them to come and fetch their citizen, the Rhodians very prudently sent a man-of-war to escort him, but forbade their captain to let him into the ship because it was the Alexandrians who were ordered to deliver him at Rome. Accordingly when the Rhodian ship would not receive him, and Demetrius pressed him to embark, as did the Phaselitans, who greatly feared they might get into a scrape with Rome, he got terrified at his situation and came back to the Alexandrian vessel. But finding a favourable chance he ran away again to Caunos, and tried the same game. The Caunians being allies of the Rhodians, and repulsing him, he sent to the people of Cibyra, with whom he had friendly relations, because the children of their dynast, Pancrates, had been educated in his house at Rhodes. These people foolishly consented, and got both him and themselves into still greater trouble. For neither did they dare to keep him, nor were they able to send him to Rome, as they were an inland people totally unacquainted with ships. So they had to send to Rhodes and to the Roman general in Macedonia, asking them to come and take the man. The general ordered them to send him over to the Rhodians, and directed them to undertake his delivery. So in the end he came to Rome, having made as public a display of his folly and meanness as he possibly could, being surrendered all round the eastern world by reason of his own absurdity.'

This passage is worth citing at length for many reasons, and I shall refer to it again in another connection. But I need hardly say that if Polybius's principles were so grossly violated by these unfortunate people, there were other cases, and prominent ones, where the readiness to commit suicide shows itself not only in individuals but in communities, as a curious feature of the times. The terrible resolution of the Abydenes stands out as a foremost example. Philip V., in spite of the representations of both Rhodian and Roman envoys, had been pressing the siege of Abydos, to which the inhabitants made the most heroic resistance. I have before alluded (p. 416) to this case, where the population, when refused an honourable capitulation, bound themselves by oath to die one and all. 'And seeing the number and the eagerness of those who were slaying themselves and their children and their wives by fire, hanging, drowning, and leaping from the roofs, Philip was alarmed, and grieved at what was taking place, so he said he would give a respite of three days for those who wished to hang or slay themselves. And the Abydenes, having already determined concerning their condition, and considering themselves as it were traitors to those who fought and died for their country [under the solemn resolution before adopted], would not endure to live unless they were already constrained by chains, and no longer their own masters; all the rest without hesitation went in families to die.' 'This is the resolution which Polybius honours with his highest praise, and complains of fortune for annulling their decision, and putting their women and children, about whom they were so desperately resolved, into the hands of their enemies.

We may be sure there was some very vigorous, nay, enthusiastic and extreme Stoic teaching behind these awful facts. But history has left us no clue to the names of the men who could persuade a whole population into such marvellous heroism.

Enthusiasts indeed there were, and very strange ones, as we learn from the story of the massacre of a Roman noble,

Octavius, who was sent to Syria when Epiphanes was dead, to demand from his successor the strict observance of the conditions imposed upon the kingdom by Rome, which were: To reduce the army to 5000 men, hamstring all the elephants, and burn all the ships of war. 'These conditions having been so long neglected as to be really a dead letter, the result was an outburst of public indignation, and a man called Leptines murdered the Roman envoy.¹ Of course a very suppliant embassy was sent by King Demetrius to Rome, with a large present of gold, bringing with them the murderer, and many protestations that the king and court had nothing to do with it. 'The senate refused to receive the murderers, for,' says Polybius, 'the king sent not only Leptines but Isocrates. This was a literary man by profession, and gave public lectures, but being by nature a talker and vain fellow and a bore, he fell foul even of the Greeks, of whom the school of Alcæus ridiculed him very smartly in controversy. Coming then into Syria and despising his audience, he was not content to lecture about his proper business, but made political pronouncements, saying that Cnæus had justly suffered, and that every other ambassador should be treated the same way, so as to have not one to report it at Rome, and so stop their proud commands and the insolence of power. Talking in this random way he got into the present scrape, and this is what happened. Leptines immediately after the murder went about openly in (Syrian) Laodicea, boasting that he had done what was right and with the approval of the gods. And when Demetrius had made good his position on the throne he went to the king and exhorted him not to fear the death of Cnæus, and pass no harsh decree against the Laodiceans, for that he himself would go to Rome and explain to the senate that he had done it according to the will of God. So at last he was sent without bonds or guard on account of his readiness and zeal.' I cannot forbear going on with this curious passage. 'Isocrates, when involved in the same charge, went completely off his head, and when he was put into fetters would hardly eat, and abandoned all care of his person. So he came to Rome a wonderful sight, at which any man would confess that both in body and mind nothing is more shocking than a man if he becomes completely savage. For his appearance was as horrible as a wild beast's, when for more than a year he had neither washed, nor trimmed his nails and hair; and as to his mind he produced such an effect by the expression and rolling of his eyes that any one would rather approach a wild beast. But Leptines stuck to his point, and was ready to go before the senate, and to those about him spoke openly of the affair, and contended that he would suffer no hurt at the hands of the Romans. And in the end his expectations were realised; for the senate, thinking, I suppose, that they would seem to the public to have obtained satisfaction for the murder if they punished those that were surrendered, would not receive them, but kept the case open, in order to use it as a grievance when occasion arose.'

¹ Appian, Syr. 46, gives the facts, which can almost all be confirmed from the remaining fragments of Polybius. 'The Romans hearing that there was an army of elephants in Syria, and ships more than the number prescribed in the treaty with Antiochus (III.), sent ambassadors to kill the elephants and burn the ships. And it was a pitiful sight to see the beasts, which were tame and rare, being killed, and the ships burning. So a man in (Syrian) Laodicea, called Leptines, unable to bear the sight, assassinated Cn. Octavius, the head of the embassy, as he was rubbing himself with oil in the gymnasium.'

I return from this illustration of the results of tyranny and oppression—the prevalence of, and respect for, suicide—to another feature which shows the increasing savagery of the times. I have already noted repeatedly the rising value of works of art, and the more conscious appreciation of statues and pictures among educated men,¹ and yet nothing is more common now than to hear of the wholesale destruction of them by invading forces. We are far now from the chivalry of the first Demetrius (above, p. 57), and not only do we find savages like the Galatians and Illyrians rifling ancient tombs and defacing temples, but we hear of civilised powers, especially Philip V. of Macedon, guilty of the most horrible outrages of this kind.² The Hellenistic fashion of filling every public thoroughfare with crowds of statues in bronze and marble gave great scope to the exercise of this brutal spirit. More frequently however, such things, if portable, were carried away to adorn the capital of the victor. In this last feature we shall find the Romans the worst of sinners.

Nothing will have struck the reader of these pages more than the violent contrasts already indicated—scepticism and credulity, savagery and urbanity, desperation and cowardice, tyranny and diplomacy. But as I have so far drawn in this chapter the darker side, I will now turn to the better features of the age.

¹ Thus Polybius (iv. 78) says that the Alpheus, after passing Heræon, comes to Aliphera, a town on a precipitous hill, having on the highest top a citadel, and in it a bronze statue of Athene, remarkable for size and beauty, but of which the origin and dedication are unknown even to the inhabitants. Every one, however, agrees as to its finish and perfection, and that it must be the work of Hecatodorus and Sostratus (Ol. 100). Even a man whose character was not genuine is called ψευδεπίγραφος, possibly a metaphor from forgeries in art.

² Cf. above, p. 417, and in Polybius's description of the destruction of the gymnasium, porticoes, and public offerings of Dion (Macedonia) by Scopas (iv. 62), and of Dodona by Dorimachus (iv. 67), both Ætolian chiefs, whose misdeeds the historian tells with special emphasis.

There can be little doubt that the manners of ordinary society were far more polished than they had been in the days of the old republics, and in spite of the violences and brutalities that I have mentioned, the every-day Greek in days of peace must have seemed a much more civilised man. Many causes contributed to this. In the first place, there was the now traditional quietist teaching of the New Comedy and of Epicurus,¹ which sought happiness in the escape from disputes, from keenly agitated public questions, from disagreeably earnest people. A great part of the pursuit of happiness consisted in the avoidance of these mental disturbances and excitements. The garden of Epicurus, therefore, even more than the Academy of Plato, must have been a school of good manners.

Perhaps a still larger influence was exercised by the establishment of the many Hellenistic kings and their courts, where stately ceremonial and elaborate etiquette put a tight bridle on the rudeness of free speech, and taught men the importance of careful politeness.² Even hostile kings treated one another with that courtesy which only a privileged order will ever sustain; and the habit of suppressing angry feelings, and using courteous language to conceal bitter hate, must have told on society outside the precincts of the aula. Thus the Roman nobles who visited these courts and kings struck everybody with their bluntness and their bad manners. The 'circle of Popilius' shocked Polybius and all the Hellenistic world; Coruncanius paid with his life for his rudeness to Queen Teuta; Marcus Æmilius was only excused by Philip V. for his boorish interruption on the ground that he was young, handsome, and a Roman—by which last is meant that he could not be expected to have any manners. And we may imagine what the manners of Octavius were when his murder was openly justified on the ground of the insolence of Roman envoys.

¹ Cf. my Social Life in Greece, chap. xi.

² Cf. as instances the story of Achæus's capture, above, p. 414; the reception of Apelles, Philip V.'s vizier, above, p. 419; and the conduct of Scopas, above, p. 437.

We must remember that this barbarous bluntness, partly perhaps caused by imperfect knowledge of Greek, came with a peculiar shock upon people accustomed to the etiquette of elaborate diplomacy, and the observation of international courtesy, even in the midst of violations of justice and right. International rights—τὰ τῶν Ἑλλήνων νόμιμα, τὰ πρὸς τοὺς Ἕλληνας δίκαια, or whatever else they were called—had been recognised long ago among the many small but distinct states of Greece, and they certainly included several generally obeyed regulations, such as the avoiding the use of poisoned arrows,¹ the releasing of prisoners for a fixed ransom,² and perhaps the most interesting of all, the formal offer to submit to arbitration which accompanies a statement of grievances, and a threat to appeal to arms. Thus the Romans demand³ that Philip shall submit to have the damage done to Pergamum estimated before a fair tribunal, and Polybius boasts⁴ that long ago, in the crisis of the anti-Pythagorean riots in Magna Græcia, and in the disputes between the Spartans and Thebans, then premier states, after the battle of Leuctra, the Achæans were made arbitrators of differences among these greater states, just as the Swiss might now be chosen by the great European powers. These questions come up

¹ Cf. my Social Life in Greece, chap. ii.

² Cf. the admission of this as a Greek custom by Pub. Sulpicius on the capture of Ægina, Polyb. ix. 42, and above, p. 472.

³ Polyb. xvi. 37.

⁴ ii. 39.

frequently during the Roman dealings with Greece.¹ Thus when Aratus tried to surprise Argos in time of peace, the new tyrant, Aristippus, who had just seized the power, brought a complaint against the Achæan League before the Mantineans as arbitrators, and recovered thirty minæ against Aratus. Diplomacy, as the ordinary reader perhaps does not apprehend, meant originally the study and knowledge of diplomata or charters, of which many in the Middle Ages were forged, in order to support encroachments upon property or long usufruct of lands without any real title. It was the constant manufacture of these old documents which led the Jesuit Huet to assert that all our Greek and Latin classics were monkish forgeries of the Middle Ages. We now use the word in its good sense² for the practice of settling international questions by discussion, and as discussion must start from common principles, and these are either rational—justice and expediency, or historical—former inheritances and treaties, we have a very large field for ingenuity of interpretation and subtlety of argument. All civilised nations, and most of all the Greeks, have pretended to adopt these means before appealing to arms, and no protest is thought more valuable than the assertion that we have done what we could to show the justice of our case by pacific argument.

The two indispensable qualities in this diplomacy were politeness and secrecy. Thus Philip, when meeting Flamininus and the Ætolians (xviii. 1) and expressing fears for his own safety owing to the Ætolian treachery, 'was thought by all to have begun the discussion in a coarse way' (φορτικῶς). Thus Polybius elsewhere specially turns aside to commend the same King Philip for having destroyed all his secret papers after the defeat of Cynoscephalæ. 'He acted like a king in not forgetting his duty even in great peril;' and this was a peculiar virtue which Philip showed together with many vices. I suppose Polybius remembered but too well the dreadful results to his country, and, indeed, to all the Greek world, from the seizure of Perseus's papers after the battle of Pydna. He also specially animadverts on a certain Astymedes, who represented Rhodes at this latter moment in Rome, and who did his best to avert the wrath of the republic. 'Now Astymedes thought that he had spoken right well for his country, but he did not at all please the Greeks that were sojourning, or that resided, at Rome. Nay, he presently published his speech in a pamphlet, which appeared to most of those who read it both ill-timed and quite untrustworthy. For he based his defence less on the justice of his country's case than on the accusation of others.' This was done by exaggerating all the good points of Rhodes in direct comparison with other states, which he sought to degrade and vilify. 'People thought this sort of defence not worthy of a politician, for in such men we do not praise those concerned with secrets who disclose their correspondents through fear or for gain, but rather regard as really good and brave men those who submit to any punishment or torture to avoid implicating others. So this man, who in the face of an only probable danger brought all the mistakes of others under the knowledge of the dominant power, and refreshed again what time had cast into oblivion, could hardly escape censure.'¹

¹ Cf. Polyb. xxiii. 2; xviii. 1 sq.; xxxii. 17.

² For its bad sense of knavery, cf. above, p. 401.

It was this desire of secrecy which made Hellenistic kings often employ as envoys discreet men, such as artists or physicians, who travelled apparently on their own business. This was what Eumenes did, and even a Roman general, but in his case it was commented on as strange that a 'gymnastic trainer' should be so employed by the Romans, who were generally very formal in these matters.¹

¹ Cf. Polyb. xxx. 2, 3, and above, p. 538.

In harmony with this fashion of polite discussion when points of difference arose was that of sending formal embassies of congratulation to rival powers, and the more strained the relations the more punctilious was the ceremony. We may be certain that of all the crowd of powers represented by embassies at Rome in 189 B.C., when the world gathered to congratulate the great Republic for the victory of Magnesia and the defeat of Antiochus the Great, very few indeed were sincere in their declarations, and that the real sentiments cloaked under formulæ of praise were those of suspicion and alarm. But all this was concealed under smiling faces and gifts of golden crowns. Whenever a king of Egypt was proclaimed, the whole world went there also in embassy, perhaps to spy out the land, perhaps to make combinations against the young king at his very court, but still the official politeness was carefully observed. We saw above how king Prusias took it as an offence nearly amounting to a casus belli that the Byzantines had sent a state embassy to the Founders' Feast at Pergamum, whereas they had neglected to do so to his festival at Nicomedia. Here is a narrative from Polybius which illustrates both these features, the courtesy and the diplomacy together.²

When Antiochus Epiphanes made his successful expedition into Egypt, and was practically master of the country, it was determined to obtain the interference of neutral powers. So first of all the Privy Council determined to send the Greeks who happened to be staying at Alexandria as ambassadors to discuss a settlement of the war. The gentlemen so present were as follows:—two separate embassies from the Achæan League, one about the renewal of friendly relations (with the young king, who had not long succeeded), another about the festival and competition of the Antigoneia (at Corinth). From Athens there was an embassy about a bounty (from Egypt), and two sacred missions (θεωρίαι), one about the Panathenaic festival, and one about the Mysteries. There were besides two men from Miletus and two from Ephesus. With these the young king sent Tlepolemus and Ptolemy the rhetor. Thus we see seven several embassies upon public affairs, and affairs of social import, all at Alexandria together; most of those from Greece seem to have been in quest of subscriptions for mere games and feasts from richer Egypt.

¹ xxvii. 7.

² xxviii. 19.

Antiochus received all these people in the friendliest and most hospitable way, and, after feasting them, gave them audience. First the Achæan, then an Athenian, and thirdly a Milesian made speeches. But as they all spoke on the same basis and for the same end, their arguments were practically the same; they all laid the blame on Eulæus (the young king's tutor, who had set on the war by laying claim to Syria), and they all put forward Ptolemy's youth and his family connection with Antiochus as a reason why the latter should moderate his resentment. But Antiochus, corroborating all this, and even confirming their arguments, proceeded to explain the justness of his claims on historic grounds, and then laying stress on the recent assertion of this in war by his father Antiochus (the Great), denied absolutely the agreement which the Egyptians alleged between the Ptolemy just deceased and Antiochus the Great, that the former was to receive Coele-Syria as dowry when he married Cleopatra, the mother of the present king.

Arguing from these premises, and having persuaded not only himself but all those that heard him of the justness of his cause,¹ he set out for Naucratis. This was the dispute, and this the diplomatic question settled by the brutal Popilius with his walking-stick and his circle in the sand.

Again, we have Philip arguing with Flamininus when he was ordered to liberate all the cities of Greece under his sway. What do you mean by Greece? How do you define it? Most of the Ætolians, with whom the Romans were in league, were not accounted Greeks. He asked might he therefore conquer and possess these? Indeed the whole of this discussion, held under the most peculiar and suspicious precautions, by T. Flamininus and his Greek allies with Philip,² and which Flamininus enjoyed thoroughly, is very characteristic of the times. There is nothing which Polybius reports with more evident delight than these discussions. Thus on one occasion when an Achæan assembly met at Megalopolis³ to hear the report of their ambassadors, who brought back a large present (200 talents of copper coin and 6000 bronze weapons) from Egypt, and a polite proposal 'to renew the former treaty' to which they had agreed, Aristænus gets up and asks, What treaty? He then proceeds to read out several former treaties inconsistent with one another, and puts the embassy to shame so thoroughly that the whole meeting thought him the only man who knew his business, and agreed to his 'moving the previous question.'

The gift of money, however, was accepted; and this suggests another curious debate at the same meeting, where the King of Pergamum offered a large sum under slightly different circumstances.

¹ See the closely similar arguments of his father Antiochus III. against Ptolemy Philopator, also given by Polybius, v. 67, quoted above, p. 408.

² xviii. 1 sq.

³ xxii. 10.

Among various embassies sent from Egypt, Syria, and elsewhere, with gifts and compliments to the League, there appeared envoys from King Eumenes, offering 120 talents (£25,000) to the League, on condition that it should be put out at interest to provide for the yearly expenses of members of the Council in attending the assemblies of the League. This was proposed with all the politeness possible by the envoys. Whereupon Apollonides of Sicyon rose and said that as far as the amount went, it was a gift worthy of the League, but as regards the intention of the donor and the use he had proposed, it was most disgraceful and illegal. For when the law absolutely forbade any person, either private or official, taking any gift whatsoever from the king, nothing could be more illegal than to be bribed en masse by receiving this money, and what was worse, receiving it publicly. For that the Council should be regaled every year by Eumenes, and then deliberate on public affairs, having, so to speak, swallowed the bait, was plainly mean and mischievous. Eumenes was making offers now, presently Prusias would do so, by and by Seleucus; but as monarchies and republics had natural antipathies, and as from these differences arose most of their own relations to kings, either it would result that the interests of these kings would be preferred to patriotism, or that those who opposed their paymasters would be considered ungrateful to them. Apollonides therefore proposed the rejection of the gift as an insult to the League. The assembly being further reminded by an Æginetan present that Ægina had been bought by Eumenes for thirty talents from the Ætolians, when they and the Romans had taken it in the recent war, the rejection of this great gift was voted with loud acclamations.

Eumenes indeed incurred such odium throughout

Greece by the affair of Ægina, and by his opportunism, which often made him take the Roman side in the quarrels of the day, that all his statues set up by grateful cities in the Peloponnesus had been overturned and the votive inscriptions effaced. This was regarded so grave a thing in those days that we hear of a regular diplomatic mission to have them restored, and his brother Attalus appeared at an Achæan assembly, where there was a long and doubtful debate on the point (xxviii. 7). It seems that those who carried out the previous order had exceeded their powers, as Polybius himself contended at the meeting. He argued, I suppose with politic falsehood, that as the decree against Eumenes had only been intended to prevent excessive and fulsome honours, so now the assembly should remedy the excess which had been shown in doing him dishonour. Ultimately it was carried that Attalus should receive the compliment he sought for his brother, and that not only the statues, but what was thought more important, the panegyric inscriptions,¹ should be restored.

I will only cite one more instance of the public courtesy of the times, afforded us by the visit of Attalus I., the predecessor of Eumenes II., to Athens. He was formally invited to come and confer with Roman envoys and with the Athenians about the outrages of Philip. Having had a private conference with the Romans, as soon as he arrived, at the Piræus, he made his state entry, together with the Roman envoys, next day. The hospitalities had been voted by public decree of the city. Not only all the magistrates, with the knights, but the whole body of citizens, with their wives and children, came out to meet him. This last particular, the wives and children, is the Hellenistic feature of the affair. There was boundless enthusiasm. When he entered at the Dipylon the street within was lined with priests and priestesses. After this they opened all the temples, and bringing victims begged him to sacrifice. Finally they established a new tribe, to be called after him, so placing him in the rank of an 'eponymous hero.' But when they invited him to address their assembly he excused himself and said it would be offensive to appear in person and rehearse his benefits to those who had received them. So they did not press him, but asked for a written communication of his views. He did not scruple to take credit in this letter for his benevolences, by way of preamble to a strong recommendation to declare war against Philip.

¹ xxvii. 18, μὴ μόνον τὰς ἀναθηματικὰς ἀλλὰ καὶ τὰς ἐγγράπτους τιμὰς.

In summing up this fragmentary picture of the Hellenistic Empire which was now being swallowed up by Rome, I must remind the reader that our evidence is almost wholly confined to public men and matters, and that, even there, vices are always more prominent than virtues. The impression produced on me by a long study of those times, though hardly to be verified by direct quotations, but by stray inferences and by reasoning back from the evidence of later times, is that private life and manners were both purer and more refined than they had been in the great days of Greece. Slavery had certainly become milder, and manumissions more frequent. National exclusiveness had received its death-blow, by the widening of parochial into imperial and transmarine policy. Religion in the proper sense was far more diffused. For if men were now very sceptical as to the traditional myths and creeds, they were far more serious as to the duties of life. The Stoic and Cynic philosophers afforded them an itinerant clergy, which contrasted strangely with the established priests, whose offices were rich sinecures, and were often held by professed unbelievers.¹ And if the separation of society into clergy and laity, into the serious and the worldly, has its bad side, nevertheless the very setting up of a higher standard of life is of no little service. Even the people that only pretend to it increase its influence as a fashion, and so many weak and neutral characters drift into virtue with the current of the day.

The same thing may be said of the amenities of life. If people were still keen about adorning their cities with statues and public buildings, we may be certain that much more care was bestowed on the inside of private houses, and that pictures, pottery, and plate were not only more elegant but far more widely used. The very frequency and pertinacity with which the enemy destroyed works of art in an invasion, together with the loud complaints that it was a gross violation of the laws of honourable warfare, shows what value men put on these refinements of life.

Literary taste indeed had by no means sustained itself in the same way. With the exception of Homer, who stood alone and apart as a sort of Bible, which even serious philosophers read night and morning for their moral instruction,² we must admit that the sense of literary perfection was not vouchsafed to this generation. They had Alexandrian authors, love poems, novels, controversial tracts, the history of cooking, and still more the cooking of history by compilers and partisans, and thought the rhetoric of Rhodes and Tarsus better than the grace of Plato or the force of Demosthenes.

The other signs of better civilisation were, therefore, not accompanied by any remarkable development of literature.

¹ Cf. the case of Pyrrho, a complete sceptic, being made a high priest at Elis in Diog. Laert. ix. 11, § 64.

² Cf. Diog. Laert. on Arcesilaus.

Apollonius Rhodius, the last of the great Alexandrian golden age, died an old man in 188 B.C. Aristophanes of Byzantium, the first great man of the new critical school, was rising into note. Eratosthenes and Archimedes, the most splendid representatives of Alexandrian science, were now advanced in age or dead, and left no worthy successors. The poets of the new tragedies and comedies performed by strolling companies, the writers of smart epigrams, the second-rate pamphlets of later philosophers—all this is not of any note or worthy of any close inquiry. But we may observe the increasing habit of making known opinions and carrying on controversies by public letters rather than by real discussion. Aratus's Memoirs were plainly an apologia pro vita sua; another case of these controversial documents is where he and Cleomenes were struggling for supremacy, and he foiled Cleomenes in his attempt to meet the Achæans at Argos. Then Cleomenes responded by an open letter accusing Aratus of cowardice and treachery, to which Aratus replied, and they even condescended, says Plutarch, to attack one another's private life, relations with women, and the like. It is probably from this date therefore that the habit of collecting or copying the letters of famous men came into fashion. The body of these handed down to us is mostly spurious, and composed by rhetoricians and sophists on the model of what might or ought to have been said, but the prevalence of such forgeries points to genuine documents having existed, and being sought after by the public.

Yet if they had lost the inestimable education of the great masters, they had certainly gained—what is generally more effective in society—the habits and thoughts of travelled men. Many in every city had seen Antioch and Alexandria, had made campaigns into Asia, or endured slavery in

Carthage, and had returned with experiences far wider than could fall to the lot of the Periclean Athenian. Quite apart from the 'braggart captain' that appeared in the later comedies, there must have been many really educated by these military services, just as Descartes and other men of his day sought foreign travel under the guise of mercenary service.¹ So then the cultivated Greek of these later days differed from his far more highly trained and literary forefathers as a travelled man nowadays, a soldier or sailor, differs from the literary man of far greater attainments who has never left his provincial town. The former is far inferior in knowledge and in theoretical matters to the latter, but he is far more agreeable, and has more manners and more tact, for he is a man of the world, and his experiences make up for his want of severe mental training.

And yet the gain was not all upon the surface. For we must respect the society which let the New Comedy die out, because it preferred the lectures of the philosophers. Nevertheless we cannot but see such symptoms of decay as would certainly have led to some great gradual change had not the Roman conquest supervened. The constant political frays, which could never be allayed save by the military force of a stronger power from without; the unequal distribution of wealth, which produced an angry and dangerous proletariat; and, worse than all, the rapid diminution of population in Greece and Macedonia, are clear and painful evidences of this decay. Asia Minor, on the contrary, which had long abandoned all idea of liberties beyond those of internal order and police in the cities, was in a prosperous condition, and full of wealth and energy.

What might have happened is, however, of no account; what did happen was a terrible and ruinous conquest.

¹ Cf. my Life of Descartes (Blackwood, 1881).

CHAPTER XXIII

THE IMPORTATION OF HELLENISM TO ROME

WHATEVER may have been the misfortunes which befel the islanders and the kingdom of Pergamum as consequences of Roman dominion, there was one feature absent,—that wholesale deportation or enslavement of the better classes which ruined for ever the future of Macedonia, Epirus, and Greece. The 1000 exiles, of whom Polybius was one, left all the management of their respective cities to far inferior men ; and when, after their weary captivity of seventeen years, the remainder came home embittered by despair and deteriorated by burning resentment, they found the whole condition of the Peloponnesus altered, and most of that moderation and reticence which marks men of breeding and culture gone for ever.

Far worse was the case of Macedonia, where every man of mark, every noble, every official, was deported, so that the whole country was deprived of its upper classes and their influence. But far worst of all was the fate of Epirus, where 150,000 people were literally sold into slavery, and the country so depopulated that by and by Augustus had to gather a whole district together to make his one new town, Nicopolis. Even in an age when population is increasing, and society is young and vigorous, such dreadful calamities might have been irremediable, but in the decaying days of an old culture, which wanted new blood and new stimulus to keep it from failing with decrepitude, they were absolutely ruinous. From the time of the capture of Corinth the Hellenic peninsula almost disappears from history, except as the accidental theatre of those terrible Roman campaigns in the Civil Wars, which must have drained the last life-drops of remaining prosperity with their requisitions and exactions.

Greek Hellenism did not submit to these cruelties without fierce death struggles. The Romanised Polybius, or at least Polybius in the history he composed for Roman readers, wonders at the heaven-sent madness of the Macedonians, who, after they had received 'their liberty,' and their taxes were reduced to half the amount they had paid their kings, yet rose up in constant insurrections,¹ and joined the standard of any pretender to the royal blood who promised to rescue them from their new and precious privileges! There is no judgment in the historian more monstrous. A people of old feudal and monarchical habits had their royal family abolished, their nobility destroyed, all the tokens of their ancient splendour carried away as spoil, and were given a brand-new democratical code by the victors as an ample substitute! And this was called liberty, when the country was divided into four sections, and all intercourse strictly forbidden between them! What family ties must have been broken, even among those who had not been deported, what trade relations ruined among all those whose business was more than parochial! How intolerable to old friends and connections through Macedonia to find all intercourse interdicted, and their noble fatherland cut into sections by new and artificial boundaries ! And presently they found Roman merchants going freely to and fro and monopolising by this privilege even the real home trade of their country, which the new laws had rendered impossible to native enterprise. These false Philips, these bloody insurrections were, therefore, only the agony of a noble nationality, which if conquered was not subdued, and which passed away for ever with rage in its heart and curses upon its tongue.

¹ Cf. the parallel case of the Ætolians cited above, cap. xix. p. 447.

The fate of Greece was far less tragic, and yet Polybius, whose judgment is here very different, rises to eloquence in describing the national terror and despair when the last great blow was seen coming upon his country. He says¹ that when Critolaus was dead, and the law required the previous Commander of the League to resume office, pending a new election, Diæus, the most violent of the so-called nationalist party, came back to power. He immediately made great requisitions of men, not only free, but home-born slaves, whom he ordered to be liberated and armed. All this was done capriciously, and without just allotment as regarded the wealth or resources of individuals. He made all pay heavy taxes, and commanded a general levy to meet at Corinth. 'From these causes all the cities were filled with perplexity, confusion, and dismay. And men praised the lot of those that were dead, but pitied those who were setting out (for Corinth), and all lamented them, foreseeing the end ; and they were troubled by the insolence and the laziness of their servants, some of whom were just freed, and others set up by this hope. Together with this men were obliged to contribute out of proportion to their means, and women, deprived of their own and their children's ornaments, paid them in taxes as it were deliberately for their own destruction.

¹ xxxix. 8.

‘But all these things, coming upon them together, distracted by their separate griefs the attention of men from the general consideration that they were all being brought to manifest destruction, with their wives and children. So, as it were, carried along by the violence of some mountain torrent, they obeyed the folly and infatuation of their leader. The Eleans and Messenians indeed remained at home, expecting the advent on their coasts of the Roman fleet; but nothing would have saved them, had it appeared according to the original plan. The people of Patræ had already been among those defeated in Phocis (by Metellus), and their condition was even worse than the rest. For some desperately resigned their own lives, and others fled out into the country at random, with no definite aim, on account of the terror pervading the towns. And there were some who handed up their neighbours to the enemy as being hostile to Roman interests, and some who accused and informed against their neighbours, when nobody asked or wanted them to do it. Others went out as suppliants, confessing that they had violated the treaty, and asking what they must suffer, when no inquiry of the kind was being instituted by any one. And everywhere there prevailed a strange epidemic of men throwing themselves from cliffs or into tanks, so that even an enemy who beheld it would have pitied the agony of Greece.’

Let me add that the Romans carried away not only the nobility, but the very traditions of the people they conquered. This feature in Roman conquests had already been noticed in the case of Syracuse, from which every public ornament was carried away by deliberate public command to Rome, and Polybius¹ censures this idle and mischievous rapacity, which perpetuated the hatred of the vanquished, in terms as severe as he ventured to use when writing under the eye of his Roman patrons. The conquered cities were deprived of their gods, their heroes, the splendid works and generosities of their forefathers, the monuments which gave them a position in the world and a reputation among men.

¹ ix. 10.

And what did the Romans gain by all these civilised crowds of men, whom they deported with statues, pictures, and treasure to Rome?

The first thing that strikes us when we hear of the whole nobility of Macedonia, and then of Achæa, being scattered through Italy, is that this large though compulsory immigration ought to have had an important influence on Italian life. And yet, except in the solitary instance of Polybius, not one word transpires to tell us that such was the case. We do not hear of a single remarkable man descended from this foreign blood, and tracing his origin to Macedonian or Greek nobility. We do not hear of any country town which was humanised by these noble exiles, or which benefited by their culture. What on earth became of them all? The son of King Perseus was a petty clerk in a country town, and so earned a miserable livelihood. The terrible invasion of Hannibal had depopulated vast tracts of Italy, which urgently demanded new population, yet no attempt was made to gather these educated exiles into new centres of cultivation as well as culture. When Tiberius Gracchus travelled through Italy a dozen years after the fall of Corinth, he finds the latifundia invading all the country—herdsmen who were slaves, pasture, but no free population. The captives were not allowed to settle in the cities of Magna Græcia, where they might have found a home, but in those of Etruria and Umbria, where the populace could not understand them, and where they died out gradually as isolated and broken-hearted strangers. This it was which filled with such rage

the hearts of the 300 Achæans who returned after seventeen years of internation in Italy, so that they could think of nothing but impotent revenge. If many Greeks were now slaves in Italy, many Italians had long been slaves in Greece, and the 1200 liberated by the Achæan League in compliment to Flamininus were only a small remnant like the 300 Achæans who came home from Italy. Yet all these contacts produced no national approximations. There was deep antipathy between the Romans and the Greeks, an antipathy based upon strong contrasts of character, and contempt of each for the faults of the other—want of intelligence in the Roman, want of rectitude in the Greek.

If then Hellenistic men were such complete foreigners in Italy, we may be sure that the art treasures which they valued, and which represented Greek civilisation, were not much better understood.

Polybius, when describing the sack of Corinth (146 B.C.), which he had witnessed, mentions specially the reckless destruction of precious works of art and historic monuments. He says he saw pictures thrown upon the ground, and soldiers using them for diceboards. He mentions specially Aristeides's picture of Dionysus, and Hercules writhing in the tunic of Dejanira.¹ Such things are all the more remarkable when we consider that the Roman armies had already some training in Hellenistic campaigns, and that the soldiers of that day were no longer honest yeomen, but a class which served for the deliberate purpose of gain and plunder. They had all seen or heard of the campaign of Magnesia, and again of the campaign of Pydna, when the wealth of Macedon had been exhibited at the triumph of Æm. Paullus, and even then (167 B.C.) there had been discontent to the verge of mutiny in the army, because the stern general had curtailed their share of the booty. It is perhaps unreasonable to expect from the mere soldiery of any age, even our own, an appreciation of art, but in the army of Mummius this barbarism reached as high as the officers, and even, it is said, the commander-in-chief.¹

¹ xxxviii. 13.

What the Roman better classes had been a few years before, when the treasures of Macedonia were brought home to them, is told us in a passage of Polybius, as interesting perhaps as anything in the records of this time. 'L. Anicius, says the excerpt, the Roman prætor, having conquered the Illyrians, and bringing captive King Genthius with his children, did some funny things when celebrating his victory by public games and contests at Rome. For he engaged all the most famous artists to come from Greece, and having set up a vast stage in the circus, he first introduced all the flute-players together. They were Theodorus, Theopompus, Hermippus, etc., who were then very celebrated. Having put them on the proscenium with the chorus, he desired them all to blow away. But when they proceeded to go through their melody with the appropriate figures, he sent up to tell them they were not playing properly, and directed them to have more of a contest.² And as they were puzzled at this, one of the lictors showed them by gestures that they were to turn one against another, and, as it were, make a kind of fight of it. So the flautists promptly perceiving it,

¹ The 37th oration ascribed to Dio Chrysostom says that Mummius, when he carried off Greek statues to Rome, did not know by what names to call them, and that he had Zeus inscribed on the statue of the Isthmian Poseidon, and Nestor and Priam on two statues of Arcadian youths from Pheneus. This at least shows in what estimation Mummius's artistic notions were held. The story of his requiring his contractors to replace any work of art lost or broken on the way to Rome is in the same vein.

² The creature probably thought that ἀγών meant a conflict only, and not generally a contest.

and taking up a tune appropriate to their own orgies, caused a tremendous confusion ; and turning the middle against the ends of the chorus, and blowing at random so as to make discords, they led one side in turn against the other ; and along with them the choristers with loud beating of feet, and shaking the stage, advanced against their opponents and retired in turn. But when one of the chorus tucked up his dress, and, suddenly turning round, raised his fists in a boxing attitude at the flute-player advancing against him, forthwith great applause and shouts of delight burst from the audience. And while they were still fighting their pitched battle, two dancers with musical accompaniments were brought into the orchestra (in front of the stage), and four boxers also ascended the stage with trumpeters and horn-blowers. When these all went on together, the result was indescribable. I suppose people will think I am joking in what I am going to add about the performance of the tragedies.' And here the wretched excerptor breaks off the text.¹

Such were the people who had been listening to Plautus for at least a generation, and for whom various attempts had been made by clever Latin poets to introduce the beauties of Greek literature in translations ! Yet the complaints of Terence as to his Hecyra, which the whole public deserted to attend a bear-fight, seem to show that not even the teaching of this very polished adapter of Greek plays, whose Latin attains classical elegance, had any large effect. There was, of course, what Mommsen calls the Scipionic circle, a small set of enlightened men standing aloof from, and despising, the masses, to whom both Polybius and Terence were attached, and who attained a great deal of Hellenistic polish without losing all the braver qualities of Roman nobles. It is for these men that Polybius feels such reverence, and whom he contrasts so broadly with his own nation.

¹ xxx. 14.

But the nation was always very strange to him, and with very much the strangeness which an Irishman feels in Englishmen, however oft and long he may sojourn in England. 'A Roman lady who drinks wine (which was forbidden) cannot escape notice, for it is the habit to kiss all her own and her husband's relations, as far as first cousins, whenever she first meets them in the day.'¹ At the same time, the state of a great Roman lady, which he describes in connection with Scipio Æmilianus's generosities,² was quite above that of any Greek woman, even of many Hellenistic queens. But this very passage shows us that generosity of character, especially as to money, was almost unknown at Rome, and that to pay a debt one day sooner than the fixed day, or to give one farthing as a gift, was quite unheard of. This is of a piece with the coarseness and brutality of their warfare. They were not cruel perhaps in the sense that the Greeks were, but brutal in massacring, and selling into slavery ruthlessly, without admitting the custom of ransom received all through Hellenism. Even captive kings were, as a rule, starved to death or executed as malefactors.

Nevertheless there was a great regularity and method in all their life, in which lay the secret of their superiority to the Greeks. Whether it was the regulating of an army, with its camp, its discipline, and its entrenchments, or the herding of swine, which was also done on an immense scale to the sound of trumpets,³ which these beasts were taught to obey, there was order and system in Roman life. And until Greek license came in, which Polybius sees already depraving the conquerors, the incorruptibility of Roman nobles was quite signal in comparison with the conduct of

¹ vi. 2.

² xxxii. 12.

³ xii. 3, xviii. 18.

Greeks. I have above quoted a passage where this is stated, but there is much additional evidence. Antiochus the Great offered Scipio Africanus large moneys to make him a favourable peace just before the battle of Magnesia, which were contemptuously set aside, though, by the way, the second Scipio, who was then actually commanding the army, was not above suspicion. So the Ætolians went about charging T. Flamininus with being bribed by Philip to give him easy terms after Cynoscephalæ; but nobody would believe them.¹ Yet Flamininus, too, had a brother of singular worthlessness.

Thus we see how the Roman virtues, based rather upon tradition, and exercised in great public duties, than the result of rational thinking, were rapidly being invaded by the intellectual vices which came in from the East. In the very house with the true noble were the coarse debauchee and the contemptible snob.² Polybius tells us of a certain Aulus Postumius, of the highest family, but by nature a babbler and very vain, who, being enamoured of Greek culture and letters, spent all his time at them, so that he afforded an argument to the conservative elders at Rome against this culture; and at last he undertook to write a poem and a political history in Greek, in the preface of which latter he apologised for being unable, as a Roman, to master the niceties of the Greek language and its style. For this he was of course ridiculed, as nobody had urged

¹ Cf. xix. 35. 'I, as regards earlier times, and making a general statement, made bold to say of all the Romans that they would do no such thing—I mean before they entered upon their transmarine wars, and still abode by their old national customs and habits. At the present time I should not venture to make the statement absolutely, but I would undertake to prove, in the majority of cases, that Romans can preserve their honour under such circumstances.'

² On the brutal and cynical side of the Roman nobility, cf. above, p. 444.

him to undertake the task. The rest of his life, says Polybius, exhibited the worst points of Greeks, viz. love of pleasure and avoidance of work, for being in Phocis at the commencement of the campaign of Metellus, who commanded till Mummius arrived, he retired, pretending illness, to Thebes to avoid the danger; but when the battle of Scarpheia was over, he was the first to announce to the senate the victory, giving details as if he had himself taken a part in the fight.¹ This class of person was pandered to by a perfect invasion of Greeks; as Polybius observed to Scipio: 'If you want instruction, you have no lack of teachers to help you, for I see a whole tribe of such people pouring in from Greece.'²

Hence a great and sudden collapse of the Roman character, especially after the complete success of the last Macedonian war. Every kind of luxury and vice was indulged in with extravagant cost; a minion or a mistress cost a talent, and with no fear of any rival in power, the Romans adopted all the luxury of refinement wholesale from Macedonia, with no intellectual training to resist the injurious part of its influence.

Much of the blame must be laid upon the senate, which never devised any rational means of governing its transmarine subjects, or dealing with transmarine diplomacy. It started with trusting almost absolutely some one man like T. Flamininus, who happened to have Greek training, and who did almost what he liked in the East. When the mistakes of individual statesmen grew apparent came the era of Commissions, which must have been very delightful to Roman nobles, who went about like kings at public cost, and enjoyed all the delights of Hellenistic life, but brought home partial and superficial reports. It was as if we were now to govern Ireland by the reports of commissioners, or of tourists who come over to inquire into each quarrel, without keeping a government office and permanent officials to report regularly upon the course of affairs. We cannot find that the Romans ever devised any system of residents at foreign courts, like those we now keep at the courts of Indian kings, or of ambassadors, whom the senate could trust both from their position as great patricians, and from their experience as long residents in the country.¹ For what can tourist commissioners ever find out accurately, especially from a population admirably suited and very eager to deceive them?

¹ xxxviii. 12. The Hellenistic counterpart of this person was the Epirot Charops, who came as a young man to Rome to learn the Latin tongue and letters (xxvii. 15), but who turned out a terrible scourge to his country from his wickedness, combined with the influence he obtained at Rome.

² πολὺ γὰρ δὴ τι φύλον ἀπὸ τῆς Ἑλλάδος ἐπιρρέον ὁρῶ κατὰ τὸ παρὸν τῶν τοιούτων ἀνθρώπων, xxiii. 10.

Alternating with these Roman commissions abroad, was the stream of Hellenistic embassies to Rome, not to speak of princes and politicians who went on embassies for themselves, to gain favour and power by means of private friendships with great houses at Rome. There is evidence

¹ M. Lepidus, living as tutor regis in Egypt, was an exception which the senate should have made the rule. Thus Polybius says (xxxii. 28), when relating the quarrel between Prusias and Attalus, that 'the people in Rome paid no attention (οὐ προσεΐχον) to the statement made to the senate by Andronicus, but suspected (ὑπενόουν) that Attalus was substantially the aggressor, and when ambassadors from the other side came, distrusted (ἠπιστρει) even more what had been said. By and by the senate in perplexity about the matter (ἀμφιδοξήσασα) sent out commissioners to inquire (cf. also xxxii. 21).

Achæus, on the contrary, a new sovran in Asia Minor, had three accredited agents in Rhodes and Ephesus (viii. 18, and above, p. 409). There was such a demand for commissioners that, on one occasion at least, three men were sent to the East, who were a public laughing-stock, being all broken-down invalids.

of this at every turn in the generation now before us. For example,¹ when it was known that the senate would receive charges against Philip V., a whole series of people came to make complaints both for cities and privately. Polybius enumerates them all, and says that the senate was completely puzzled with the complexity of their evidence. The king's side was represented by his son Demetrius, to whom the senate was very favourable, with that nefarious policy which sought to raise up enemies and rivals to every Hellenistic sovran within his own house.

Nothing can, indeed, be more pitiable and disgraceful than the Roman policy to Greece and the East during this crisis. As I have already described it (p. 446 sq.), I will only here add a sentence from Polybius. 'Though often professing inability to decide, and declaring that they would no longer interfere, they showed plainly in many instances that, far from desiring to get rid of such foreign questions as were not pressing, they were much offended if everything in their allied Greek states was not referred to them and done with their approval ;'² and this obsequiousness was distinctly the policy of the Roman party in the Achæan League, as opposed to the patriots.³

It is needless to insist upon the sort of ambassador who was most likely to succeed under such circumstances. There is evidence through Polybius that the answers of the senate were not properly recorded or published, so that the envoys could report with modifications, or the senate give a fresh answer contradicting the former without being exposed.⁴ Here again the want of foreign representatives was an incurable defect. So the people succeeded who were like Deinocrates the Messenian—αὐλικὸς καὶ στρατιωτικός, ἦν δὲ ψευδεπίγραφος καὶ ῥωπικὸς, to use the curious words of Polybius. Even the three philosophers sent by Athens, who made such a sensation at Rome, did so by their deliberate display of eloquence and of learning, which, indeed, cannot have been understood by many who pretended to do so, as their business in the senate was done through an interpreter, C. Acilius.¹

¹ xxiii. 1.² xxiii. 17.³ xxiv. 11.⁴ For evidence of this very strange want of written and published records, cf. xxxii. 21, when Charops, being snubbed at Rome, suppressed the answer he got from the senate, and invented quite a different one to tell at home.

It is clear enough that by this time the Greeks at Rome, οἱ παρεπιδημοῦντες, were quite a colony, in the sense that we now speak of the English colony at Naples or Florence. They were a public in themselves, with an opinion of their own, which was clearly expressed. This Greek public opinion at Rome is often alluded to by Polybius. It must have been a fashionable society too, for at the head of it were always a number of Hellenistic princes, to whom I have often referred as being the instructors or depravers of the aristocratic Roman youth. Thus Demetrius, who had been from childhood a hostage in Rome, when Antiochus Epiphanes died, desired eagerly to be restored to his home, and claimed the kingdom from the senate.² He urged his case in that he regarded Rome hitherto as his real home and nurse, and that the sons of the senators stood to him in the relation of brothers, but they themselves of fathers. When the senate saw his ability and vigour, they declined his suit, thinking it better to give the kingdom of Syria to a weak child, with Demetrius to be utilised in case national opposition arose. The result was that Demetrius took the matter into his own hands, and escaped to win his kingdom for himself. The narrative is so characteristic that I give it here in detail.

¹ Aul. Gellius, Noct. Att. vi. (vii.) 14.

² xxxi. 12.

So Demetrius having in vain sung his song of despair before the senate, turned back to the advice Polybius had given him, not to stumble twice over the same stone, and consulted his old tutor Diodorus, who had just come from Syria. The latter assured him that everything was ripe for a change, and that if he suddenly appeared with a single slave in attendance, he would probably gain the sovereignty without active interference of the senate. But the starting point was to escape from Rome unobserved, and without his design being suspected. So Demetrius sent for Polybius, and having explained to him his whole plan asked him to assist in it, and help him in planning his escape.

Now it happened that there was in Rome at the time a certain Menyllus of Alabanda, ambassador from the elder Ptolemy (Philometor) for the discussions with the younger (Physcon), with whom Polybius was very intimate, and in whom he trusted thoroughly, so thinking him a suitable instrument he introduced him with the strongest recommendations to Demetrius. Accordingly Menyllus undertook to make ready the ship and other necessities for the voyage, and finding at the mouth of the Tiber a Carthaginian ship which had come on some religious service, chartered it. It happens that these vessels are specially selected from Carthage, in which the Carthaginians send to Tyre the traditional first-fruits for the gods. He therefore chartered it openly for his own return passage, so that he made arrangements for provisioning it without suspicion, and openly spoke and bargained with the sailors. So when the skipper had all ready, and it only remained for Demetrius to accomplish his part, he sent off his tutor to Syria to gather news and feel the pulse of the population. But his companion from youth, Apollonius, was privy to the plot, and communicated it to two brothers, Meleager and Menestheus, and to none of the rest of their many intimates. These were sons of a high Syrian officer who had been dismissed by Antiochus Epiphanes. When the appointed day came, it was necessary to manage a reception at the house of a friend, for Demetrius could not dine at home, seeing that he was particular in inviting all his household to dine with him. Those who were privy were to come from home after dinner with one slave each to the ship, for the rest they had sent on to Anagnia, intending to follow them next day. Now

Polybius was at the time sick and in bed, but was kept informed by Menyllus of everything ; and feeling very anxious lest if the dinner was protracted, as Demetrius was naturally convivial and a mere boy in disposition, some hitch should occur in their departure through drunkenness, he wrote on a small tablet, and having sealed it, sent it by his slave as it was growing dusk, with orders to call out the cupbearer of Demetrius and give it to him, without telling who he was or whence he came, with orders to let Demetrius read it at once. The tablet contained the following maxims [culled from Greek comedies] :—

‘The Doer from the Dallier takes the prize.’

‘The night is fair, but fairer to the bold.’

‘Do, dare, encounter danger and defeat,’

‘but forfeit not, O fortunate, thyself.’

‘Be sober and cherish mistrust ; these are the thews of the mind.’

As soon as Demetrius had read this and perceived whence it came, he affected sickness and took his leave, accompanied by his friends ; and when he reached his lodging (at Rome) he sent such of his servants as were in the way to Anagnia, ordering them to meet him with hunting nets and dogs at Circeii, for he used constantly to hunt the wild boar, which indeed was the origin of his intimacy with Polybius. He then disclosed his plot to Nicanor’s party, and called upon them to help him. And when they all agreed, he told them each to hurry home and direct their slaves to precede them before dawn to Anagnia, and meet them with the huntsmen at Circeii, but to put on travelling dress themselves and come back to him, telling the servants that they would meet them next day with Demetrius at the appointed place. All this being done, they went off by night to Ostia at the mouth of the Tiber. Meanwhile Menyllus had gone before them, and had a talk with the sailors, saying something had reached him from the king (of Egypt) which necessarily detained him in Rome for the present, but that he would still send some of the trustiest youths about him, from whom the king would learn all about the claims of his brother. So he said he would not embark himself, but that the others would come about midnight. It was all the same to the skipper, as the sum agreed upon was not altered, and they were now ready for some time ; so at the end of the third watch the party came, eight in number, with five slaves and three boys. So when Menyllus had given full instructions, and showed them their provisions, the captain set sail at dawn, with no suspicion that he was bringing anybody with him but some soldiers from Menyllus to Ptolemy.

It was four days before the absence of Demetrius was explained, and on the fifth, when the senate was hastily summoned, he was already past the Sicilian straits with a favouring wind.

This Demetrius was a good specimen of that class, considerable in its importance if not in its numbers, which was trained at Rome to support Roman policy and Roman interests in the East. Whether rightful heirs to their respective thrones, or doubtful claimants, kept for an awkward moment and let loose by the senate to disturb the peace and growth of any kingdom which seemed likely to assert itself, they were all taught to depend on the Republic, and to screen their vices and their crimes by influence at the centre of affairs. What the effect must have been on the decaying fragments of Alexander's empire was only too obvious. On the other hand we have the baser sort of Greeks influencing their Roman masters at first from beneath as servants, tutors, artists ; and also in many illegitimate and vicious ways. Thus the first marriage of Greek civilisation with Roman life was disastrous enough, and it was long before it produced a healthy offspring. In literature Terence was perhaps the first hopeful specimen of what Latin could do in imitating the great models of Hellenism, and yet in Terence it is only graceful form which is attained ; there is hardly a single great or noble idea. But here we must break off and relegate the growth of better things, of the spiritual Hellenism of later days, to another season.

I cannot conclude better than by calling the reader's attention to the prominence in that day of a great problem which is still awaiting its solution in many parts of the world—the problem of the relative claims of imperialism and of nationality to dominate among men. With the rise of Alexander's empire a great blow was struck in favour of imperialism. Whatever national distinctions remained, the Egyptian, the Syrian, the Phrygian, the Bithynian, felt the glamour of Hellenism, and sought to belong to the great Greek empire of language and of culture. Until the Parthians and the Jews asserted themselves against the Seleucids, we hardly hear of any assertion of separate nationalities to separate rights, and the cultivation of a separate language or an exclusive religion was regarded as mere backwardness in civilisation. We have seen too, even in the case of the Jews, how nearly that tough and implacable nation had lost themselves in Hellenism, and how it was rather the accidents than the natural march of history which forced on the reaction.

So far then imperialism seemed not only to be coming into fashion, but even imperialism of a fixed type ; and the world seemed to have gained greatly by it. But it was imperialism within moderate limits. The large number of kingdoms produced many capitals, and so while there was undoubtedly centralisation and bureaucracy, with a complete control of most things from each capital, there were not only innumerable 'Greek' towns with city-liberties, but the court and its officers were not too remote from their subjects of various creeds and languages, so that these latter could make themselves felt. Whatever losses and hardships may have been inflicted on Syrians and Egyptians by the establishment of the Seleucid and Ptolemaic empires, no one will contend that it would have been better for those nationalities had they followed an isolated path, and had Greek energy and culture not come to the aid of decaying Semite and Hamite life. Centralisation under a foreign nationality brought them new life even in their non-Hellenic aspects, for had there been no Ptolemies there would not have been a tithe of the splendid temples—Egyptian temples—which still tell us of the spirit of old Egyptian culture. Had there been no Antioch and Alexandria, Jewish literature would have died out into Talmud and Pirke-aboth, and none of the long series of Hellenistic books would have seen the light which reach in an unbroken series down to the Gospel of St. John. Let, therefore, separate nationalities subordinate themselves, we might say, to great Hellenistic kingdoms, and seek their higher development not in narrow patriotism, not in the cultivation of nationality as an exclusive principle, but in the acceptance of cosmopolitan culture.

This has been exactly the solution reached in the modern divisions of Europe. It was undoubtedly better for all that the Breton, the Gascon, the Provençal, the Flamand, should unite under the sovereignty of France, than that they should each insist on developing their separate nationalities. In the same way the Poles of Posen have been welded into Germany, and after long struggles have acquiesced in this decision. The case of England is quite similar; and as regards Italy, though it was rather separate political divisions than separate nations which were brought into the united kingdom, the contrasts in temper, tradition, and dialect between Piedmontese and Sicilian, Lombard and Calabrian, are quite deep enough to cause antipathies that may never disappear.

I have often repeated that the unity of Hellenism was similar to that of modern Europe, that as European culture means a definite thing, not possessed by Orientals or South Americans, so Hellenism had its own features, distinct from Italian and Eastern life. Within each of these unities then imperialism has prevailed, but with limited application.

It is but lately, within our own day in Europe, that England has led the way in an endeavour to reverse the decision of the last three centuries, first by her undisguised sympathies with Poles, Hungarians, Italians, who revolted from their sovrans on the ground of nationality, lately by permitting the public discussion of the dismemberment of her own empire into a federation upon the same ground. There are signs therefore of a reaction against imperialism in the sense of direct control of separate nationalities from a single capital and by a single government. There is a curious sentiment growing, that no nation should be governed by another that speaks a different language, or professes a different religion, or even that does not command the sympathy of that nation.

This reaction too finds grounds of support in the history we have just considered. If the imperialism of Alexander, modified by his successors, did splendid service in stimulating the nations, and compelling them, as it were, to do their work by consultation, the imperialism of the Roman Republic which replaced it did hardly any good, and incalculable mischief. When modified and purified by Augustus and his successor, it produced certain material blessings—peace, good roads, good laws, and in the end contentment, but intellectually a terrible decay, and ultimately financial ruin. The touch of Rome numbed Greece and Egypt, Syria and Asia Minor, and if there are great buildings attesting the splendour of the empire, where are the signs of intellectual and moral vigour, if we except that stronghold of nationality, the little land of Palestine?

Here then it appears as if imperialism had been overdone, or applied in the wrong way, and that the living, various, complicated unity of Hellenistic imperialism had been succeeded by a hard, dead, unsympathetic power, which could not assimilate without crushing, or assist without patronising. Without going deep into the question, we may see that most of these evil results came from the ancient axiom in statesmanship, that the conquered were merely to live for the benefit of the conquerors, and that not only the nobles and merchants but the mob of Rome were to live and grow rich upon the provinces. If England now administered her empire exclusively and confessedly for the enriching of nobles and merchants in London, and for the support in idleness of the London poor, we should have conditions approaching those of Rome and her subjects.

But I will not proceed further. This great and still-vexed problem is introduced to show the reader that in one more instance he may study the new in the old—modern theories in bygone examples. Polybius suggests that men would avoid being captured by the same stratagems, as is ever happening, if they read history and learned its lessons. He probably meant this for an advertisement of his own work. I am not so sanguine as to hope that my book will be of the same practical use, or that it will turn the ‘most silly of animals’ into something more sagacious. It is enough for me to hope that some current theories in politics and views of social life may be tested by the curious analogies of Hellenistic life, and that men will thus learn the living value of ancient history, if any history can be called ancient that deals with the ripe autumn of a full-grown civilisation.

APPENDIX A. (Cf. p. 247.)

οἷν μὲν φίλος υἱὸς ἀνήγαγεν Οἰάγροιο Ἄγριόπην θρῆσαν στειλάμενος κιθάρην ἄδόθεν. ἔπλευσεν δὲ κακὸν καὶ ἀπεχθέα χῶρον, ἐνθα Χάρων κυανὴν ἔλκεται εἰς ἄκατον ψυχὰς οἰχομένων, λίμνη δ' ἐπὶ μακρὸν αὐτεῖ ῥεῦμα διέκ μεγάλων συρομένη δονάκων.
ἀλλ' ἔτλη παρὰ κῦμα μονόζωστος κιθαρίζων
Ὀρφεύς, ἀνταίους δ' ἐξανέπεισε θεούς· Κωκυτόν τ' ἀνέθιστον ἐπ' ὄφρύσιν οἰδήσαντα εἶδε, καὶ αἰνοτάτου βλέμμ' ὑπέμεινε κυνός, ἐν πυρὶ μὲν φωνὴν τεθωμένον ἐν πυρὶ δ' ὄμμα,
σκληρὸν τριστοίχοις δεῖμα φέρον κεφαλαῖς.
ἐνθεν ἀοιδιάων μεγάλους ἀνέπεισεν ἄνακτας Ἄγριόπην μαλακοῦ πνεῦμα λαβεῖν βιότου.
οὐ μὲν οὐδ' υἱὸς Μήνης ἀγέραςτον ἔθηκε Μουσαῖος χαρίτων ἥρανος Ἀντιόπην, ἥ τε πολὺν μύστησιν Ἐλευσῖνος παρὰ πέζαν εὐασμὸν κρυφίων ἐξεφόρει λογίων, Ῥάριον ὀργειῶν νόμῳ διαποιπνύουσα Δήμητρι· γνωστὴ δ' ἐστὶ καὶ εἰν αἶδη.
φημὶ δὲ καὶ πατρῶον ἀποπρολιπόντα μέλαθρον
Ἡσίοδον, πάσης ἥρανον ἱστορίας, Ἀσκραίων ἐσικέσθαι ἐρῶνθ' Ἐλικωνίδα κώμην· ἐνθεν ὃ γ' Ἡοίην μνώμενος Ἀσκραϊκὴν πόλλ' ἔπαθεν, πάσας δὲ λόγων ἀνεγράψατο βίβλους, ὕμνων ἐκ πρώτης παιδὸς ἐναρχόμενος.

αὐτὸς δ' οὗτος αἰοιδός, ὃν ἐκ Διὸς αἶσα φυλάσσει, ᾗδαι τὸν πάντων δαίμονα μουσοπόλων, λεπτὴν δ' αἶς Ἰθάκην ἐνετείνετο θεῖος Ὅμηρος ᾧδῇσιν πινυτῆς εἵνεκα Πηνελόπης, ἣν διὰ πολλὰ παθὼν ὀλίγην ἐσενάσσατο νῆσον, πολλὸν ἀπ' εἰρείης λειπόμενος πατρίδος· ἔκλεε δ' Ἰκαρίου τε γένος καὶ δῆμον Ἀμύκλου καὶ Σπάρτην, ἰδίῳν ἀπτόμενος παθέων Μίμνερμος δὲ τὸν ἡδὺν ὃς εὗρετο πολλὸν ἀνατλὰς ἦχον καὶ μαλακοῦ πνεῦμα τὸ πενταμέτρου, καίετο μὲν Ναῦνοῦς, πολλῶ δ' ὑπὸ πολλάκι λωτῶ κημωθεὶς κώμους εἶχε σὺν Ἑξαμύῃ.
 ἦχθετο δ' Ἑρμόβιον τὸν αἰεὶ βαρὺν ἡδὲ Φερεκλῆν ἐχθρὸν μισήσας οἷ' ἀνέπεμψεν ἔπη.
 Λυδῆς δ' Ἀντίμαχος Λυδηίδος ἐκ μὲν ἔρωτι πληγεὶς Πακτωλοῦ ρεῦμ' ἐπέβη ποταμοῦ· Σαρδιανὴν δὲ θανοῦσαν ὑπὸ ξηρὴν θέτο γαίαν κλαίων. Αἰζάνιον δ' ἦλθεν ἀποπρολιπὼν ἄκρον ἔσω Κολοφῶνα, γόων δ' ἐνεπλήσατο βίβλους, γηρὰς ἐκ παντὸς παυσάμενος καμάτου.
 Λέσβιος Ἀλκαῖος δὲ πόσους ἀνεδείξατο κώμους, Σαπφοῦς φορμίζων ἡμερόεντα πόθον, γιγνώσκεις. ὁ δ' αἰοιδὸς ἀηδόνας ἡράσαθ' ὕμνων, Τήιον ἀλγύνων ἀνδρα πολυφραδίῃ.
 καὶ γὰρ τὴν ὁ μελιχρὸς ἐφωμίλησεν Ἀνακρέων στελλομένην πολλαῖς ἄμμιγα Λεσβιάσιν· φοῖτα δ' ἄλλοτε μὲν λείπων Σάμον, ἄλλοτε δ' αὐτὴν οἰνηρὴν ὄρεσιν κεκλιμένην πατρίδα, Λέσβον ἐς εὖοινον· τὸ δὲ μῦσιον εἶσιδε Λεκτόν πολλάκις αἰολικοῦ κύματος ἀντιπέρας ἀτθὺς δ' οἶα μέλισσα πολυπρήωνα Κολωνὸν λείπουσ' ἐν τραγικαῖς ᾗδε χοροστασίαις βάκχον, καὶ τὸν ἔρωτ' ἐγέραιρε Θεωρίδος, οἶσθα
 . . . Ζεὺς ἔπορεν Σοφοκλεῖ.
 φημὶ δὲ κακέϊνον τὸν αἰεὶ πεφυλαγμένον ἄνδρα καὶ σπανίων μῖσος κτώμενον ἐκ συνόδων

πάσας ἀμφὶ γυναῖκας, ὑπὸ σκολιοῖο τιπέντα τόξου νυκτερινὰς οὐκ ἀποθέσθ' ὀδύνας.
 ἀλλὰ Μακεδονίης πάσας κατενίστατο λαύρας, Αἰγείῳ μέθεπεν δ' Ἀρχέλεω ταμίην, εἰσόκε σοὶ δαίμων, Εὐριπίδη, εὔρετ' ὄλεθρον Ἀμφιβίου στυγνῶν ἀντιάσαντι κυνῶν ἄνδρα δὲ τὸν Κυθήρηθεν, ὃν ἐθρέψαντο τιθῆναι Βάκχου, τὸν λωτοῦ πιστότατον ταμίην,
 Μοῖσαις παιδευθέντα Φιλόξενον. οἷα τιναχθεὶς Ὀρτυγίην ταύτης ἦλθε διὰ πτόλιος, γινώσκεις, αἶουσα μέγαν πόθον, ὃν Γαλατείης αὐτοῖς μηλείοις θήκαθ' ὑπὸ προγόνοις.
 οἶσθα δὲ καὶ τὸν αἰοδόν, ὃν Εὐρυπύλου πολιῆται
 Κῆροι χάλκειον στήσαν ὑπὸ πλατάνῳ Βαττίδα μολπάζοντα θοήν, περὶ πάντα Φιλητᾶν ῥήματα καὶ πᾶσαν τρυόμενον λαλίην.
 οὔδε μὲν οὐδ' ὅποσοι σκληρὸν βίον ἐκτήσαντο ἀνθρώπων, σκολιὴν βαιόμενοι σοφίην, οὗς λιτὴ περίπικρα λόγοις ἐσφίγξατο μῆτις καὶ δεινὴ μύθων κῦρος ἔχουσ' ἀρετή, οὐδ' οἷδ' οἶνον ἔρωτος ἀπετρέψαντο κυδοιμὸν φαινόμενον, δεινὸν δ' ἦλθον ὑφ' ἡνίοχον.
 οἷη μὲν Σάμιον μανίη κατέδησε Θεανοῦς Πυθαγόρην, ἐλίκων κομψὰ γεωμετρίας εὐρόμενον καὶ κύκλον, ὅσον περιβάλλεται αἰθήρ, βαιῇ ἐνὶ σφαίρῃ πάντ' ἀπομασσόμενον.
 οἷψ δ' ἐχλίνεν ὃν ἔξοχον ἔχρη Ἀπόλλων ἀνθρώπων εἶναι Σωκράτη ἐν σοφίῃ Κύπρις μηνίουσα πυρὸς μένει. ἐκ δὲ βαθείης ψυχῆς κουφοτέρας ἐξεπόνησ' ἀνίας οἶκί' ἐς Ἀσπασίης πωλεύμενος· οὐδέ τι τέκμαρ εὔρε, λόγων πολλὰς εὐρόμενος διόδους.
 ἄνδρα δὲ Κυρηναῖον ἔσω πόθος ἔσπασεν Ἴσθμου δεινός, ὅτ' ἀπιθάνης Λαίδος ἠράσατο ὄξυς Ἀρίστιππος, πάσας δ' ἠνήνατο λésχας φεύγων, οὐδ' ἀνέμων ἐξεφόβησε βία.

APPENDIX B. (Cf. p. 259.)

ἃ μὲν τόσσ' εἰποῖς Ἑρυσίχθονι τεῦχε πονηρά, αὐτίκα οἱ χαλεπὸν τε καὶ ἄγριον ἔμβαλε λιμὸν, αἰθωνα, κρατερόν· μεγάλα δ' ἐστρέφγετο νοῦσψ, σχέτλιος ὅσσα πᾶσαιτο, τόσων ἔχεν ἥμερος αὐτίς.
 εἵκατι δαῖτα πένοντο, δυνώδεκα δ' οἶνον ἄφυσσον.
 τόσσα Διώνυσον γὰρ ἃ καὶ Δάματρα χαλέπτει καὶ γὰρ τῇ Δάματρι συνωργίσθη Διόνυσος.
 οὔτε μιν εἰς ἐράνως οὔτε ξυνδείπνια πέμπον αἰδόμενοι γονέες. προχανὰ δ' εὐρίσκετο πᾶσα.
 ἦνθον Ἴτωνιάδος μιν Ἀθαναίας ἐπ' ἄεθλα, Ὀρμενίδαι καλέοντες· ἀπ' ὧν ἠρνήσατο μάτηρ·
 οὐκ ἐνδοῖ· χθιζὸς γὰρ ἐπὶ Κρανῶνα βέβηκε, τέλθος ἀπαιτήσων ἑκατὸν βόας. ἦνθε Πολυξῶ, μάτηρ Ἀκτορίωνος, (ἐπεὶ γάμον ἄρτυε παιδὶ) ἀμφοτέρων, Τριόπαν τε καὶ νύεα, κικλήσκουσα· τὰν δὲ γυνὰ βαρύθυμος ἀμείβετο δακρυχέοισα, νεῖταί τοι Τριόπας· Ἑρυσίχθονα δ' ἤλασε κάπρος Πίνδον ἀν' εὐάγκειαν, ὃ δ' ἐννέα φάεα κείται.
 δειλαία, φιλότεκνε, τί δ' οὐκ ἐψεύσαο, μᾶτερ;
 δαίνυεν εἰλαπίνας τις; ἐν ἀλλοτρίοις Ἑρυσίχθων.
 ἄγετό τις νύμφαν; Ἑρυσίχθονα δίσκος ἔτυψεν,
 ἥ ἐπεσ' ἐξ ἵππων, ἥ ἐν Ὀθρυϊ ποίμνι ἀριθμεῖ.
 ἐνδόμυχος δ' ἠπειτα πανάμερος εἰλαπιναστὰς ἦσθιε μυρία πάντα· κακὰ δ' ἐξάλλετο γαστήρ αἰεὶ μᾶλλον ἔδοντι. τὰ δ' ἐς βυθὸν οἶα θαλάσσας ἀλεμάτως ἀχάριστα κατέρρρεεν εἶδατα πάντα.
 ὥς δὲ Μίμαντι χιῶν, ὥς ἀελίῳ ἐνι πλαγγῶν, καὶ τούτων ἔτι μείζον ἐτάκετο· μέσφ' ἐπὶ νευρὰς δειλαίῳ ἱνές τε καὶ ὀστέα μῶνον ἔλιφθεν.
 κλαῖε μὲν ἃ μάτηρ, βαρὺ δ' ἔστενον αἱ δὺ ἀδελφαί,
 χῶ μαστὸς, τὸν ἔπινε, καὶ αἱ δέκα, πολλάκι, δῶλαι.
 καὶ δ' αὐτὸς Τριόπας πολιαῖς ἐπὶ χεῖρας ἔβαλλε, τοῖα τὸν οὐκ αἶοντα Ποσειδάωνα καλιστρέων· ψευδοπάτωρ, ἴδε τόνδε τεοῦ τρίτον· εἵπερ ἐγὼ μὲν σεῦ τε καὶ Αἰολίδος Κανάκης γένος. αὐτὰρ ἐμείο τοῦτο τὸ δείλαιον γένετο βρέφος. αἶθε γὰρ αὐτὸν βλητὸν ὑπ' Ἀπόλλωνος ἐμαὶ χέρες ἐκτερέϊξαι.

 νῦν δὲ κακὰ βούβρωστις ἐν ὀφθαλμοῖσι κάθηται·
 ἦ οἱ ἀπόστασον χαλεπὰν νόσον· ἥέ μιν αὐτὸς βόσκει λαβών. ἀμαὶ γὰρ ἀπειρήκанти τράπεζαι.
 χῆραι μὲν μάνδραι, κενεαὶ δέ μοι αὖλιες ἦδη τετραπόδων. ἦδη γὰρ ἀπηρνήσαντο μάγειροι.
 ἀλλὰ καὶ οὐρῆας μεγαλᾶν ὑπέλυσαν ἀμαξᾶν,
 καὶ τὰν βῶν ἔφαγεν, τὰν Ἑστίᾳ ἔτρεφε μάττηρ,
 καὶ τὸν ἀεθλοφόρον καὶ τὸν πολεμήϊον ἵππον,
 καὶ τὰν αἴλουρον, τὰν ἔτρεμε θηρία μικκά.
 μέσφ' ὅτε μὲν Τριόπαο δόμοις ἐνὶ χρήματα κείμεν,
 μῶνοι ἄρ' οἰκείοι θάλαμοι κακὸν ἠπίσταντο.
 ἀλλ' ὅτε τὸν βαθὺν οἶκον ἀνεξήραινον ὀδόντες,
 καὶ τοθ' ὁ τῷ βασιλῆος ἐνὶ τριόδοισι καθῆστο,
 αἰτίζων ἀκόλως τε καὶ ἐκβολα λύματα δαιτός.

APPENDIX C. (Cf. p. 276.)

Ἦ ἄρα δὴ μάλα πάντες ἀμαρτίνοοι πελόμεσθα ἄνθρωποι, φέρομεν δὲ θεῶν ἑτερόρροπα δῶρα ἀφραδέϊ κραδίῃ· βιότοιο μὲν ὅς κ' ἐπιδευῆς στρωφᾶται, μακάρεσσιν ἐπὶ ψόγον αἶνον ἰάπτει ἀχνύμενος, σφετέρην δ' ἀρετὴν καὶ θυμὸν ἀτίζει, οὐδέ τι θαρσαλέος νοέειν ἔπος οὐδέ τι ῥέξαι, ἐρρίγως, ὅθι τ' ἄνδρες ἐχεκτέανοι παρέωσιν,
 καὶ οἱ θυμὸν ἴδουσι κατηφείῃ καὶ οἰζύς.
 ὅς δέ κεν εὐοχθῇσι, θεὸς δ' ἐπὶ ὄλβον ὀπάξῃ καὶ πολυκοιρανίην, ἐπιλήθεται οὐνεκα γαίαν ποσσὶν ἐπιωτεῖβει, θνητοὶ δέ οἱ εἰσὶ τοκῆες, ἀλλ' ὑπεροπλίῃ καὶ ἀμαρτωλῇσι νόοιο

ἴσα Διὶ βρομέει, κεφαλὴν δ' ὑπέρανχον ἀνίσχει, καίπερ ἐὼν ὀλίγος, μνάται δ' εὖπηχυν Ἀθήνην,
 ἥέ τιν' ἀτραπιτὸν τεκμαίρεται Οὐλυμπόνδε,
 ὥς κε μετ' ἀθανάτοισιν ἀρίθμιος εἰλαπινάζη.
 ἢ δ' Ἄτῃ ἀπαλοῖσι μετατρωχῶσα πόδεσσιν
 ἄκρης ἐν κεφαλῇσιν ἰνώστος καὶ ἄφαντος ἄλλοτε μὲν γραίῃσι νεωτέρῃ, ἄλλοτε δ' αὖτε ὀπλοτέρῃσι γρη῏ς ἐφίσταται ἀμπλακίῃσιν,
 Ζηνὶ θεῶν κρείοντι Δίκη τ' ἐπίηρα φέρουσα.

APPENDIX D. (Cf. p. 333.)

From Mr. JACKSON'S Dalmatia, etc., vol. iii. p. 257.

' Venice, the inheritor of the commercial greatness of Aquileja, had now attained a degree of maritime power that brought the coast cities, both of Dalmatia and Istria, under her influence. She had taken upon herself the sovereignty of the sea, and the charge of protecting the commerce and the marine of the riparian towns. Although there was not at first any question of political subjection, the cities of Istria had from an early period paid for the protection of the Venetians by a contribution in money, and by a contingent of men and armed vessels, which sailed with the Venetian fleet under the orders of the Venetian admiral, and helped to keep the police of the seas. These relations led to the acquisition of lands in Istria by Venetian nobles and ecclesiastical corporations, and the Republic began in time to assert an authority over the province which provoked resistance both from the Istrians themselves, and from the German marquis who represented the emperor or king of Italy. An attack by the Marquis Winter on the property of the Venetian citizens in Istria provoked the Senate to retaliate by suspending all commerce with the province: the Istrians were nearly ruined, and the marquis, with the bishops and representatives of the principal towns, was reduced to implore the pardon of the Republic, and to promise to respect the property of her citizens.'

INDEX

- ABU Simbel, inscription of, 166.
 Abydos, desperate resolution of its inhabitants, 541.
 Academy, the first, 146, 311.
 Academy, the French compared to Museum of Alexandria, 508.
 Acarnania, 19, 358.
 Achæa, 7, 325 ; its League, 358 sq., 368 sq., 447 sq., 521 sq. ; relations with Syria, 463.
 Achæans, deportation of, 451, 538.
 Achæus, uncle of Antiochus III., 313, 352, 392, 395, 569 ; siege and capture of, 409 sq.
 Achilles Tatius, 197.
 Acilius, C., 571.
Acontius and Cydippe, the story of, 236-7, 272.
 Actors, dramatic, high position of, 386.
 Adonis song, at Alexandria, 282.
 Adoption, frequent at Rhodes, 335.
 Adriatic, the, 333.
 Adule, inscription of, 289, 320.
 Æetes, 273-5.
 Ægæ, 216.
 Ælian, quoted, 498.
 Æneas, ancestor of Roman kings, 93, 446.
 Æolic dialect, used by Theocritus, 255.
 Æschines, 1, 19.
Ætia, the, of Callimachus, 236 sq., 241, 267.
 Ætolia, 7, 9, 91, 366-7 ; its influence, 439, 440 ; license of, 447 ; conquered, ibid. ; treachery of, 547.
 Agathocles, minister of Ptolemy IV., 422 sq.
 Agelaos of Naupactus, 420, 441.
 Agis III. of Sparta, 294 sq., 357, 366.
 Agron, King of Illyria, 358.
 Alcibiades, 349.
 Alexander the Ætolian, 243.
 Alexander the Molossian, 65.
 Alexander I. of Macedon, 18.
 Alexander III. of Macedon (the Great), effects of his life, 1 sq., 9 sq. ; his death, 14 ; an epitome of the age, 15 ; his last illness, 26-7 ; his policy in Asia Minor, 12 ; his last rescripts, 13 ; the ideal of the age, 17 sq. ; oriental tendencies, 31 ; his plans incomplete, 32-3, 191 ; his knight errantry, 49, 53 ; his literary style, 55 ; tomb, 197 ; marriage of, 338 ; his treatment of the Jews, 468-9 ; its reasons, 470.
 Alexander IV., 60, 179, 181.
 Alexander Polyhistor, 493.
 Alexander the Ætolian miser, 524-5.
 Alexandra, see Cassandra.
 Alexandria, in Egypt, 160 sq. ; climate of, etc., 163, 175, 183 ; Museum of, 193 sq. ; splendour, 197, 282 ; literature of, 225 sq. ; life in, 290 sq., 394 ; emeute at, 426 sq. ; Jews in, 468, 481, 490 ; massacre of Ptolemy VII. at, 504 sq. ; literature at, under Aristarchus, 508 ; science at, 510.
 Alexandria Troas, 326.
 Alexarchus, 58.
 Alexis quoted, 133.
 Aliens in Hellenistic society, 104.
 Aliphera, 544.
 Alketas, 68.

- Allegories, 110, 203, 339, 495 ; in theology, 514.
 Amasis, King of Egypt, 167 sq. ; low habits of, 168.
 Amazons, 67.
 Ambassadors, want of permanent, in Roman government, 569.
 Ambracia, 53.
 America, 328, 369.
 Amphion, 337.
Anacleteria, the, of King of Egypt, 436, 499, 549.
 Anacreontics, 255-6.
 Anaxarchus, 132.
 Andromachus, 353.
 Andros, defeat of Egyptians at, 357.
 Anecdotes, 71-2, 319.
 Anicius, L., Roman prætor, his triumphal games, 564 sq.
Anthology, the, cited, 231, 248-9, 276.
 Antigone, 51.
 Antigoneia, on the Orontes, 42, 305, 384.
 Antigonus (Monophthalmos), general of Alexander, 35, 333 ; character of, 41-2, 45, 59.
 Antigonus I. (Gonatas), King of Macedon, 37, 51, 69, 212-3 ; policy of, 214 sq., 230, 356 sq., 373 ; death, 312, 389.
 Antigonus II. (Doson), King of Macedon, 342 ; accession, 360 ; policy and death, 360-2.
 Antigonus of Karystos, 40, 143.
 Antimachus of Colophon, 235, 246, 265.
 Antioch, 305, 319, 489, 516 sq. ; earthquakes at, 518.
 Antiochis, Queen of Cappadocia, 461.
 Antiochus Hierax, 320, 325, 360.
 Antiochus I. (Soter), 47, 310.
 Antiochus II. (Theos), 310, 319.
 Antiochus III. (the Great), 325, 395 sq., 404 sq. ; why called the Great, 398 ; and the Jews, 487-8.
 Antiochus IV. (Epiphanes), his Hellenism, 436 ; at Rome, 460-1 ; character, 462 sq., 466 ; and the Jews, 489 sq. ; and Egypt, 500, 549 sq.
 Antiochus Sidetes, 492.
 Antipater, General, of Alexander, conquers Greeks, etc., 3, 13, 27, 34, 63, 77, 132 ; character of, 40-1.
 Antipathy between Greeks and Romans, 563.
 Antisthenes, 138-9.
 Apelles, Philip V.'s minister, 419 sq.
 Apelles, the painter, 108, 112, 387-8.
 Apocrypha, the, its historical value, 468.
 Apollo, Belvidere, 107 ; hymn to, 258-9.
 Apollodorus, tyrant, 159, 284.
 Apollonius of Tralles, 337.
 Apollonius Rhodius, 97 ; his controversy, 267 ; Argonautics, 269 sq.
 Apotheosis of kings, 13, 180.
 Appian cited, 542.
 Apries, King of Egypt, 167, 214.
 Aratus of Sicyon, 234, 302 ; his character, 303-4, 325, 400, 403 ; policy, 361 sq., 369, 529.
 Aratus of Sicyon, the younger, 450.
 Aratus of Soli, poet, 214, 227 sq. ; his prologue, 234.
 Arbitration, 9, 340 ; Rhodian, 344-5 ; Achæan, 546.
 Arcadia, Alps of, 7, 13, 391 ; policy of, towards Macedon, 529.
 Arcesilaus (see Arkesilaos).
 Areus, King of Sparta, 481.
Argonautics of Apollonius, 267 sq.
 Argos, 53, 78, 128.
 Ariarathes (III., IV., V.), kings of Cappadocia, 461.
 Arion, agent of Josephus at Alexandria, 477.
 Aristænetus, 237.
 Aristænus, the Achæan, 551.
 Aristarchus, 507-9, 516.
 Aristeas, 207, 471-2, 494.
 Aristippus, 138-9.
 Aristobulus, 514-5.
 Aristomenes, 430, 437, 499.
 Aristonicus, the boxer, 533.
 Aristotle, tutor to Alexander, 19, 30-1 ; his style, 114, 131, 137, 229 ; cited, 383.
 Arkesilaos, 311, 373.
 Armies, the Roman, of the second century B.C., 563.

- Arsaces, 311.
 Arsinoe, a frequent name of cities, 288, 439.
 Arsinoe, sister and queen of Ptolemy Philadelphus, 70, 205, 290, 309.
 Arsinoe, queen of Ptolemy IV., 423.
 Art, Greek, afterbloom of, 106, 112; Græco-Egyptian, 181; used as mere decoration, 201; ruin of, 417; outrages upon, 544.
 Artificiality of Hellenistic literature, 221, 281.
 Artillery, Hellenistic, 378.
 Artists, dramatic, 383, 386.
 Ascalon, coerced by the adventurer Josephus, 476.
 Asia, 10, lines of separation in, 47.
 Asia Minor, condition of, 10 sq.; settlement of land disputes in 13; cities of, 92, 300, 319, 325, 458; Jews in, 487.
 Asianic, its meaning, 315, 339.
 Astronomy of Aratus, 229; of Eratosthenes, 232; of Polybius, 234.
 Astymedes, the Rhodian, 548.
 Athenæus, quoted, 25, 58, 133, 135, 298, 300, 311.
 Athenion, 475.
 Athens, policy of, towards Alexander, 3, 14; life in, 72 sq., 292 sq.; Antipater's settlement of, 77 sq.; policy towards Demetrius P., 85-6; compared to Rhodes, 99; supremacy of, in philosophy, 145; policy towards Achæa, 361; schools of, 375 sq.; devastated, 417; receives Attalus I., 553.
 Athletics, out of fashion, 110, 377, 382.
 Athos, Mount, 58, 112.
 Attalus I., of Pergamum, 16, 312; patron of art, 313 sq.; at war with Achæus, 352 sq.; with Philip V., 433; his visit to Athens, 553 sq.
Atys, the, of Catullus, 254.
 Audiences, the, of Hellenistic philosophers, 136.
 Augeas, 276.
 Aulus Postumius, a Roman snob, 567-8.
 Authorship, mania for, 218.
 Autonomy, spirit of, 6.
 BACTRIA, its Hellenism, 155, 304.
 Balance of power, the, 363 sq.
 Barbarians, represented in Hellenistic art, 314.
 Barbarism of Romans, 563 sq.
 Barcides, the, 359.
Bath of Pallas, Callimachus's, 236, 241.
 Batrachomyomachia, the, 252.
 Battles, ancient, falsely described, 530.
 Berenice, queen of Euergetes I., 237, 241, 318-9.
 Berenice, daughter of Euergetes I., 322 sq.
 Bernays cited, 135.
 Bissell, Dr., on Apocrypha, 515.
 Bithynia, war of succession in, 346.
 Black Sea (see Euxine).
 Blass, Dr., cited, 316.
 Bœotia, life in, 301.
 Bogies, to frighten children, 259.
 Bolis, the Cretan, 409.
 Books, great production of, 217-8.
 Borysthenes, 350.
 Bosphorus, the, 329; limit of Rhodian League, 331; description of, 349.
 Bremen, 333.
 Brennus, 353.
 Bret Harte, 278.
 Bruchium, the, 183, 208.
 Brugsch Bey cited, 176.
 Brussels, 9.
 Buckle, H. T., cited, 23.
Bulletin de correspondance hellénique, 289.
 Bury, Mr. J. B., 283.
 Byzantium, 300, 331; condition of, 347 sq.
 CÆCILIUS, 445.
 Callicrates, 450.
 Callimachus quoted, 227, 290, Appendix B; his Ætia, 236 sq.; his treatment of love, 238; epigrams, 250; hymns, 256 sq.; school, 266 sq., 278.
 Callisthenes, 132.
Calumny, the, of Apelles, 203.
 Cambylus, 409.

- Canopus, the city, decree at, 322 sq.
 Canopus, the star, 231.
 Capital cities, none in Achæa or Ætolia, 7; or Macedonia, 215; type due to Alexander, 15; isolation of modern, 102-3; multitude of, 575.
 Cappadocia, Hellenism in, 461 sq.
 Caracalla, 197.
 Caravan routes, 332.
 Caria, 154; seized by Antigonos Doson, 360.
 Carlyle, T., 251.
 Carthage, destruction of, 520; mission from, 572.
 Carthaginians, 205, 359.
 Casander, King of Macedon, 26, 34; character of, 57 sq.; and Olympia, 64; and Athens, 90.
Casandreans, the, of Lycophron, 283; date of, 284.
Cassandra, the, of Lycophron, 284.
 Catalan Company, the grand, 39.
 Catullus, 241.
 Caunos, 540.
 Cavalry, Macedonian, 39; Polybius on, 522.
 Celts (see Galatæ).
 Centralisation, its proper limits, 576.
 Chabbas, an Egyptian Pretender, 177, 180.
 Chæron, 521.
 Chæroneia, battle of, 1, 5.
 Champollion, 188.
 Chandragupta (Sandracottus), King of India, 46.
 Chares of Lindus, sculptor, 334-5.
 Charops of Epirus, 449, 570.
 Chelonis, 295-6.
 Chiliarch, 45.
 Chinnock, Mr., his translation of Arrian quoted, 26-7.
 Chremonides, 216, 293, 331, 356.
 Chryseis, 342.
 Chrysippus, catalogue of his writings, 216-7; position, 371 sq.
 Chrysopolis, 349.
 Church lands in Egypt, 169-70.
 Cibra, 540.
 Cicero cited, 114.
 Cilicia, home of Stoics, 142.
 Cineas, 52.
 Cities, Hellenistic, 292 sq., 326 sq.; in Palestine, 473.
 Classical opposed to romantic, 223.
 Cleanthes, his hymn, 261-2; teaching, 371-2.
 Cleitomachus, the boxer, 532.
 Cleombrotus, 295-6.
 Cleomenes III., King of Sparta, 361 sq., 369 sq., 394; his policy, 369-70; on suicide, 538.
 Cleomenic War, 362 sq.
 Cleopatra, sister of Alexander the Great, 65-6.
 Cleopatra, a Syrian princess, Queen of Egypt, 463, 499.
 Cleopatra, her daughter, also Queen of Egypt, 504.
 Cleopatra, history of the name, 501.
 Clitus, an officer of Alexander, 19, 132.
 Clitus, an officer of Polysperchon, 82.
 Coinage, debasement of, by Ptolemy IV., 486.
 Coinage of words, by Timon of Phlius, 251.
 Colleges, constitution of various, 196; at Athens, 374.
 Collignon, M., cited on ephebic inscriptions, 379.
 Colonisation of Ptolemies and Seleucids compared, 288-9.
 Colonnades in Hellenistic cities, 197, 518.
 Colossus, the, of Rhodes, 334-5, 342.
Coma Berenices, 241, 320.
 Comedy, the New, 72, 115 sq., 240; at Alexandria, 200; quotations from, 573.
 Commander, the, of Achæan League, 419.
 Commerce, Hellenistic, 343 sq.
 Commercial Leagues, 110.
 Commissions, Roman, in the East, 445, 569.
 Comte, A., 148, 511.
Comus, the, of Milton, 240.
 Condottieri, Greek, 499.
 Confusion of poetic forms, at Alexandria, 226, 252.
 Conquest, the ancient conception of, 578.

- Controversies of philosophers, 130, 374 ; of poets, 250 ; of politicians, 556.
 Conversions, sudden, 372.
 Corcyra, 359.
 Corinth, type of trading city, 10, 215 ; treaty of, 76 ; acropolis of, 213 ; taken and retaken, 357 ; joins Achæan League, 368, 521 ; ruin of, 452, 560.
 Corinthian order in architecture, 113.
 Cortez, 39.
 Coruncanus, 359.
 Cos, 242, 327.
 Cosmopolitanism, 554.
 Couat, M. Aug., on Alexandrian poetry, cited, 222, 247, 254, 267, 269, 275.
 Country life, 307, 327.
 Courtesans, 122 sq.
 Courts, Hellenistic, 270 ; their etiquette, 419, 545.
 Cowardice, 49, 538 sq.
 Craterus, 33 ; his death, 34.
 Crates, philosopher, 132.
 Cretans, character of, 410.
 Crisis, the, of Hellenism, 392 sq.
 Critias, 134.
 Criticism, literary, in Polybius's day, 531-2.
 Critolaus, 452.
 Cruelty of Romans, 453 ; in Hellenistic world, 536 sq.
 Culture confined to a small circle at Rome, 565.
 Culture, diffusion of average, 555.
 Cupids, 273.
 Curtius, E., quoted, 19.
 Curtius, Q., 32.
 Cydippe, 237-8.
 Cynics, the, 373 ; as preachers, ibid.
 Cynthia, 246.
 Cypselus, 50.
 Cyrene, 154, 167.
 Cyzicus, 318.
 DANAË, 319.
Daniel, the book of, 468, 496.
 Daphne, feast at, 465 ; asylum, 489.
 Daphnis, 280.
 Dardanians, 358.
 Darius (Codomannus), 2, 5, 28.
 Davidson, Mr. S., 404.
 Decay, symptoms of, in Hellenism, 557.
 Decrees of Ptolemy I., 176 sq. ; of Canopus, 321 sq.
 Degradation of Greeks, 419 sq.
 Deification, 250.
 Deinocrates, 571.
 Deinon, 539.
 Delphic oracle, 135, 238.
 Demades, 78.
 Demeter, Callimachus's hymn to, 258-9, and Appendix B.
 Demetrius I. of Macedon (Poliorketes), 35, 45, 51 ; character, 53 sq., 61, 85 sq., 91, 149, 330.
 Demetrius II. of Macedon (the Ætolian), 325, 357 sq. ; his death, 359.
 Demetrius of Pharos, 421.
 Demetrius Phalereus, 90, 147-9, 382, 530.
 Demetrius the Chronographer, 493.
 Demetrius the Fair, 311, 318.
 Demetrius Soter, King of Syria, 542 ; hostage at Rome, 460 ; escapes, 571 sq.
 Demetrius, younger son of Philip V. 570.
 Demochares, 88, 90, 133.
 Democracy, enthusiasm for, 11 ; favoured by Persians and Alexander, 12 ; effects of, at Athens, 125 ; its character, 298-9 ; in Peloponnesus, 369, 528 ; in Greece, 452 ; religious in Judæa, 482.
 Demosthenes, 1-2, 15, 52 ; his policy, 5, 77, 529 ; style, 18, 316.
 Demotic papyri cited, 168, 171 sq.
 Depopulation of Greece, 292, 534 sq.
 Deportation of population to Italy, 558-9 ; of works of art, 544, 561.
 Descartes, 132.
 Diadochi, the 16, 33 ; wars of, 34 sq. ; and Epigoni, 49, 55, 59, 62, 68, 104, 112, 135, 240.
 Diæus, commander of the Achæan League, 452, 560.
 Diagoras, 134.
 Dialect, the common, 104.

- Diary, Royal, of Alexander, 26-7.
Diaspora, the Jewish, 469, 487, 491.
 Dicæarchus cited, 118.
 Dido, 249, 272.
 Digressions in Alexandrian poetry, 236.
 Dinarchus, 81.
 Diodorus Sic. cited, 54, 64, 68, 71 ;
 on Athenian democrats, 73 sq. ;
 on Antipater's settlement, 77 ; on Rhodes, 95 sq. ; on old Egyptian etiquette, 168 ; on waterspouts at Rhodes, 340 ; on pay of dramatic artists, 384 ; on Cappadocian kings, 461 ; on Scipio Æm. in Egypt, 506.
 Diogenes Laert. cited, 133 ; on Zeno's Republic, 140 ; on Museums, 145 ; on Antigonus Gonatas, 212 ;
 on Chrysippus, 217 ; on Timon of Phlius, 251 ; on Arkesilaus, 311 ; on various philosophers, 372 sq., 498.
 Diogenes the mercenary, 381.
 Dion Chrysostom cited, 225, 305, 327, 350.
 Dion, city in Macedonia, 544.
 Dionysius of Halicarnassus cited, 317.
 Dionysius of Syracuse, 299.
 Dionysus, the artists of, 383 sq.
 Diplomacy, Hellenistic, 273, 401,
 407, 547 sq.
 Divine honours claimed by Alexander,
 13.
 Divine right of kings, 396, 401.
 Dodona, 544.
 Doric dialect used by Callimachus,
 236 ; by Theocritus, 299.
Doson, Antigonus's title of, 360.
 Drama, the Alexandrian, 278-9.
 Dramatic artists, guilds of, 289, 384.
 Dromocleides, 87.
 Droysen's Hist. of Hellenism referred to, 30, 38, 53, 124, 205, 288, 305, 331, 343, 345.
 Drunkenness in Egypt, 174.
 Duruy, M. Victor, cited, 297.
 Dyrrhachium under Roman protection, 359.
 EARTHQUAKES at Rhodes, 334.
 Eastern luxuries, 8, 25, 105.
Ecclesiastes, 482 sq.
Ecclesiasticus, 327, 483.
 Echoes in Hellenistic cities, 197.
 Education in third century B.C., 376
 sq.
 Egypt, 34-5 ; under Ptolemy I., 162 ;
 supreme court in, 169 ; Persian rule in, 171 ; Ptolemaic rule in, 182 ;
 wealth of, 189 ; under Ptolemy IV., 405, 497 sq. ; Ptolemy V., 435 ;
 conquest of, by Antiochus IV., 463.
 Egyptian texts quoted, 19.
 Egyptians not in the Museum, 193 ;
 not in high offices, 208 ; neglected
 under Philadelphus, 285-6.
 Elegy, the, 235 sq.
 Elephants, use of, 29, 46, 157, 289, 332, 464, 542.
 Elis, 7, 307, 338.
 Eloquence at Pergamum, 315.
 Embassies of congratulation, 549.
 Emigration, 75, 128.
 Empire, the Roman, its evil effects, 577.
 Encomiograph, attached to Greek dramatic companies, 385.
 England, her recent efforts for nationalities, 577.
 Enumeration, a feature in Alexandrian poetry, 246.
 Epaminondas, 18, 29, 292.
 Ephebi, 376 sq. ; diffusion of, 379.
 Ephors, the Spartan, 295.
 Epics of Alexandria, 264 sq. ; short,
 of Theocritus, 277 sq.
 Epictetus, 538.
 Epicurus, 137-8, 142 sq., 148-9, 217, 374, 545.
 Epigoni, the, 46, 49 (see Diadochi).
 Epigrams quoted, 237, 242 ; the Alexandrian discussed, 248 sq.
 Epirus, 50, 358, 550.
 Epitaphs, 248.
 Eratosthenes, astronomy of, 232 ;
 geography of, 510.
 Eros, the Alexandrian, 237.
 Erysichthon, 259, and Appendix B.
 Esne, Ptolemy Euergetes's temple at, 188, 321.
Essay on Man (Pope's), 253.
 Etiquette at old Egyptian court, 168

- at Macedonian court, 23 ; Hellenistic, 545.
- Eubœa, 327.
- Euergetes (title), 323.
- Eumenes of Cardia, secretary to Alexander, 31, 34, 37-9, 42.
- Eumenes of Amastris, 309 ; and dynast of Pergamum, 310.
- Eumenes II., King of Pergamum, 450, 454 sq. ; ill-treated by Romans, 457 ; his diplomacy, 524 ; offers gifts to Achæa, 552 ; buys Ægina, ibid.
- Euripides, 269 ; his Medea compared to Apollonius's, 271-3.
- Europe, modern, compared to Hellenistic world, 363, 576.
- Eurydike, 50, 67.
- Eusebius, 493.
- Euxine, the, 304, 332, 348 sq.
- Ewald, cited, 487.
- Examinations, competitive, 378-9.
- Exiles, their return demanded by Alexander, 13, 76 ; their policy, 75 ; the Macedonian and Greek in Italy, 562-3.
- Exposing of infants, 120, 536.
- Extradition, cases of, 539 sq.
- Fable of the Bees* (Mandeville's), 253.
- Federations, rise of, in Greece, 216, 366 sq.
- Fellows of the Museum at Alexandria, 195.
- Finance, of Rhodes, 344.
- Flamininus, Titus Q., his joke about Syrians, 436 ; at Cynoscephalæ, 440 ; his settlement of Greece, 442 ; his character, 443 ; vanity, ibid. ; love of discussions, 551.
- Flamininus, L., 444.
- Florence compared to Sicyon, 301.
- Forgeries, literary, 487, 492 sq. 513 ; of diplomata, 547.
- Franciscans compared to Cynics, 373.
- Frankish kings compared to Macedonian, 21.
- 'Freeing the Greeks,' 79 sq., 92.
- Freeman, Professor, 340, 521 ; his Federal government, 368.
- Freudenthal cited, 493.
- GALATÆ, invasion of, 36, 107, 156 sq., 257-8, 348-9 ; their effect on Hellenism, 417, 544.
- Gardening, 25.
- Garibaldi, compared to Timoleon, 110 ; to Philopœmen, 441.
- Gauls, the, 314 (cf. Galatæ).
- Gasa*, 463 ; Professor Stark's, cited, 473.
- Generals, the, of Alexander, compared with those of Napoleon I., 67.
- Geneva, 9 ; arbitration of, 340.
- Genius, decay of literary, 510.
- Genthius, 564.
- Geography, in the Argonautics of Apollonius, 270 ; in Zeno the historian, 531.
- George III. of England, 23.
- Georgics of Vergil, 228-9, 244-5.
- Gerasa, ruins of, 465.
- Gladiator, the dying, 107, 157, 314.
- Goethe on the Laocoon, 336.
- Gow, Mr., History of Greek Mathematics referred to, 195, 225, 510.
- Grasberger cited, 376 sq.
- Greek idiom of Alexandria, 185.
- Greek language, decay of, 508 ; at Rome, 567.
- Greeks and Macedonians, 2, 3, 38-9 ; in Egypt, 166 sq. ; missions to Egypt, 550.
- Grote cited, 18, 21, 24, 30.
- Groups of powers, 453.
- Guardians of an infant prince, 346.
- Gymnasia at Athens, 381.
- HALCYONEUS, son of Antigonus D., 373.
- Hamburg compared to Rhodes, 333.
- Hannibal, does not expose himself, 30, 392, 404, 421 ; treaty of Philip V. with, 421.
- Hanseatic League, 154.
- Harmodius and Aristogiton, statues of, 13.
- Hebrews (see Jews).
- Hecale*, the, of Callimachus, 267 sq.
- Hecalesia, the, 268.
- Hecyra* of Terence, 565.
- Hegesias of Magnesia, 315 sq., 382.

- Helepolis, the, 98.
 Hellenion, the, at Naucratis, 169.
 Hellenism, and Hellenedom, 5, 11, 15, 19, 20, 298, 326, 328, 350; modern character of, 16, 113, 206, 339; threatened, 53; golden age of, 151 sq.; unity of, 155, 345, 347; foundation of cities, 304 sq.; its art, 314 sq.; defects, 318; in the East, 354, 453; the education of, 380-1; decay of, 402 sq., 420, 434 sq.; opposed to Romans, 450; gradations of, 453; of the Jews, described in 2 Macc., 480; and Hebraism, 485, 494.
 Hephæstion, 33, 338.
 Heraclea (Pontica), 11, 331, 346.
 Heraclitus, 138, 485.
 Herakles, son of Alexander the Great, by Barsine, 61, 96; the hero, 271, 277-8.
 Hermeias, vizier of Antiochus III., 396 sq.
 Hermes, the, of Eratosthenes, 232.
 Hermesianax, 246-7, and Appendix A.
Hero and Leander, 238.
 Herodotus, on tyrants, 6; on Persian policy, and Greeks of Asia Minor, 12; on Alexdaner I. of Macedon, 18, 24.
 Hesiod, 230, 265; referred to, 31, 166, 169-71, 174.
 Hiero II., of Syracuse, 299.
 Hieroglyphics, 322.
 Hieronymus of Cardia, 42.
 Hipparchus, astronomer, 570.
 Historians, Hellenistic, 72, 530; Jewish, 491-3.
 History, universal, of Polybius, 520.
 Holland compared to Rhodes, 331.
 Holophernes, 461, 492.
 Home Rule, in Greece, 6, 75, 125-6, 129, 447-8; in Asia Minor, 455.
 Homer, 251, 252, 265, 509, 514.
 Homeric hymns, 255.
 Horace, 255.
 Hostages, royal, at Rome, 460.
 Household of Macedonian kings, 22, 25.
 Humanity, decline in, 397.
 Hymenæus, 338.
 Hymns, the Alexandrian, 256; Delian, quoted, 290.
 Hypereides, 5, 317.
 Hyrcanus, son of Josephus, palace of, 466-7, 479; his history, 477 sq.
 I, THE USE OF, in Polybius, 531-2.
 Ialysos of Protogenes, 338.
Ibis, the, of Ovid and Callimachus, 242, 251-2, 268.
 Idleness of the upper classes, 127.
Iliad, cited, 94; the Banks fragment of, 508; Alexandrian studies on, 509.
 Ilion, new, 301.
 Illyrians, their appearance in Hellenistic history, 358 sq., 362.
 Immorality in Greece, 536.
 Imperialism, defects of Roman, 577.
 Imperialism, the problem of, 575.
 Impiety and injustice, altars to, 421.
 Impresarios, 384.
 Individualism of Hellenistic society, 109.
 Inscriptions, 322 sq., 377, 381, 385.
 Interference, policy of Roman, 570.
 International rights, 546.
 Ionic dialect, 318.
 Ipsus, battle of, 36, 51, 61.
 Ireland, analogies to Greece, 6, 102, 446, 449, 569.
 Iris, 290.
 Island cities, their peculiar position, 11, 92.
 Ismael, the Khedive, compared to Antiochus IV., 466.
 Isocrates, the Asianic rhetor, 542 sq.
 Isolation, political, in Greece, 101 sq.
 Issus, battle of, as described by the historians, 530.
 Italy, 327; depopulation of, 562.
 Ithyphallus, on Demetrius, 89.
 Ivy would not grow at Babylon, 25.
 JACKSON, Mr., book on Dalmatia, 333, and Appendix D.
 Jason, the, of Apollonius, 271, 274.
 Jerusalem, 490.
 Jews, the, 48; at Alexandria, 154, 164, 183, 291, 470; their Greek poems, 184; and Antiochus IV.,

- 464 ; in relation to the Ptolemies, 471 ; at Antioch, 473 ; and Sparta, 481-2 ; and Hellenism, 483 sq. ; pass under Syria, 487 ; literature of their reaction, 491 sq. ; and Ptolemy VI., 501 sq. ; rise of, at Alexandria, 513 sq.
- Josephus, Flav., the historian, cited, 207, 257 ; on Alexander the Great, 468, 470 ; on the early Ptolemies, 471 sq. ; on Greek names, 480 ; on Spartan connection of the Jews, 481 ; on Ptolemy VII., 486, 512 ; on the controversy before Plotemy VI., 502.
- Josephus, son of Tobias, his history, 474 sq.
- Judæa, Hellenism in, 467 sq.
- Judith*, the book of, 461, 492.
- [Familiar Greek names, such as Cleomenes, are printed with C, under which letter they will be found.]
- KALYKE of Stesichorus, 237.
- Kauaros, Galatian king, 351, 354.
- Keraunos (see Ptolemy).
- King, new conception of, 15 ; title assumed, 42, 62, 85.
- King's robes, 98.
- Kingdoms, proper limits of, 576.
- Knight-errantry, decay of, 363.
- Korupedion, battle of, 44.
- Kratesipolis, 69, 84.
- Kynane, 67.
- LAGIDÆ (see Ptolemy).
- Lake, Sir H. 347.
- Lakydes, 311-2.
- Lamia, courtesan, 56, 88 ; city, 76.
- Land question in Greece, 7, 13, 325.
- Laocoon, the, 335 sq.
- Laodice, wife of Antiochus Theos, 319, 353.
- Laodice, wife of Achæus, 413, 415.
- Laodicea (Syrian), 447, 542.
- Latifundia, 562.
- Latin sound difficult by Greeks, 443.
- Leagues, Rhodian, 339 ; Lycian, 340 ; Ætolian, 439, 447 ; Achæan, 521 sq.
- Leonidas, King of Sparta, 294, 296.
- Leonnatus, 34, 65.
- Leontium, 246, 319.
- Leontopolis, Jewish Temple of, 502.
- Leosthenes, 4.
- Lepidus, M., tutor regis, 497, 569.
- Lepsius, R., 321 sq.
- Leptines, murderer of Octavius, 542 sq.
- Lesbia, 246.
- Lethargy of the Greek world after 146 B.C., 519.
- Letronne, 439.
- Letters, publication of, 556.
- Liberty, its popularity in name, 79, 447, 455, 559.
- Library, the, of Alexandria, 195 sq.
- License at Alexandria, 291.
- Lions, 25.
- Literary activity, 217.
- Literature, of Alexandria, 225 sq. ; poems extant, 225 ; decay of, 556.
- Livy, 436 ; on Roman policy, 444.
- London, 102 sq.
- Louis XIV., his Court, 23.
- Love stories in Alexandrian literature, 233, 237-9 ; their artificiality, 247, 274-5 ; love songs, 280.
- Lucanian invasions of Magna Græcia, 350.
- Lucian cited, 203, 338.
- Lucretius, 143, 229.
- Luxury, of Ætolians, 367 ; cause of depopulation in Greece, 535.
- Luzac, on the Peripatetic Lives, 498.
- Lycia, 314.
- Lycophron, the poet, 159.
- Lycurgus (orator), 1.
- Lyde, the, of Antimachus, 235.
- Lydiades, 213.
- Lydiades the younger, 450.
- Lyric poetry of Alexandria, 253 sq.
- Lysias, the orator, 316.
- Lysimachus, King of Thrace, 35-6 ; character of, 43-4, 46, 134, 163, 309, 312.
- Lysimachus, the Acarnanian, 43.
- Lysippus, 335.
- Lysistratus, the sculptor, 111.

- MACCABEES, the, 490-1, 517.
Maccabees, the books of, viz. —I. 62, 442; II. 473, 480-1, 488, 490; III. 486; the three books compared, 489, 492.
 Macedonia, 190, 325; royalty in, 20 sq.; ruin of, 451, 558-9.
 Macedonian feeling towards Greeks, 9, 18, 38, 326, 450; towards liberty, 12; in Syria, 210.
 Macedonians, position of, after Alexander, 2, 59, 297-8; feeling on sport, 28, 58; at Alexandria, 291, 426 sq.
 Machiavelian politics, 526, 533.
 Magas of Cyrene, 258.
 Magic, Egyptian, 208.
 Magna Græcia, 65, 350.
 Mahdis, 352.
 Maids of honour, at Egyptian court, 290.
 Malay archipelago, 331.
 Manetho, 494.
 Mantinea, 345.
 Mardonius, 12.
 Marriage with foreigners, 31; of Medea, 275.
 Marsyas, 505.
 Maspero, M. G., cited, 181.
 Masses, the, not affected by Hellenistic literature, 220.
 Massilia, University of, 379.
 Mathematics at Alexandria, 194, 510.
 Mausollus, 96.
 Mazaca, capital of Cappadocia, 462.
Medea, the, of Apoll. Rhod., 272 sq.
 Medeon, in Acarnania, 358.
 Mediation in wars, 345 sq., 403.
 Medical School of Alexandria, 510.
 Medius, 26.
 Megalopolis, land of, 8; character of, 128.
 Meineke cited, 225.
 Melancholy, in Apollonius, 274.
 Melancomas, 409 sq.
 Memnon and Mentor, 96.
 Memphis, 172, 407, 506.
 Memphitis, 504.
 Menander, 115 sq.
 Menedemus, 145.
 Menelaus, 21.
 Menyllus, 77, 79.
 Mercantile interests, 333.
 Mercenaries, whence supplied, 8, 367, 402, 405; habits of, 416.
 Messenians, 276.
 Mieza, 19.
 Miletus, 310.
 Military caste in Egypt, 405.
 Militia, a citizen, its weakness, 369.
 Mill, J. S., 148.
 Miller, M. E., 289.
 Milton, 221, 266.
 Mimnermus, 235, 265.
 Mob rule at Athens, 73; at Alexandria, 291, 429.
 Moeragenes, 427.
 Mœro, 300.
 Molon and Alexander, insurgent satraps, 397.
 Molossians, 50, 538.
 Mommsen, T., 152, 445, 513.
 Monogamy in Egypt, 173.
 Morals in the New Comedy, 119 sq.
 Mummius, 564.
 Müller, K. O., 305.
 Murray, Handbook of Egypt, 321.
 Museum, the name, 145-6, 192, 291, 510.
 Music, Academy of, at Alexandria, 379; Polybius on effects of, 389 sq.
 Musicians, Greek, at Rome, 564.
 Mycenæ, 418.

NABIS, 443.
 Names, Greek, among Jews, 480.
 Napoleon I., 67.
 Napoleon III., 299.
 Nationalist party in Greece, 448 sq.; in Egypt, 499.
 Nationality versus Imperialism, 575.
 Naucratis, 169.
 Nausicaa, 276.
 Navigation, Hellenistic, 230.
 Neutrality of Rhodes, 355.
 Nicæa, 213.
 Nicanor, 79.
 Nicomachus, 409 sq.
 Nicomedes of Bithynia, 346.
 Nicomedia, 346, 353, 462.
 Nicopolis, 558.
 Nicostratus, 427.

- Niebuhr quoted, 15, 21, 26.
Nike, the, of Samothrace, 10.
 Nile, water of the, 319; rising of the, 323.
 Nobility, the English, compared to Spartan, 297-8.
 Norman barons, 52.
 Novel, the Alexandrian, 238; history of the, 239 sq.; the historical, 515-6.

 OCHUS, King of Persia, 171.
 Octavius, Cn., 445; assassinated, 542.
 Oenanthé, 428 sq.
 Old men in politics, 4; in the New Comedy, 123.
 Old Testament, the, 514.
 Olympia, truce of, 14, 76; games of, 18, 28, 338, 532.
 Olympias, 59; character of, 63-4.
 Olympiodorus, 90.
 Onias, high priest, 489.
 Onias, son of the high priest, 501.
 Opus, the Locrians of, 345.
 Oracles, quoted, 334; spurious, 514.
 Oratory in 330 B.C., 1; decay of, 382.
 Ordinances (προστάγματα) of the Ptolemies, 170, 174.
 Oriental influences on Hellenism, 142; sympathy with Heracleitus, 485.
Orlando, Shakespeare's, 239.
 Orontes, the, 210, 518.
 Orophernes (see Holophernes).
 Orpheus, legend of, in Phanocles and Vergil, 244-5; in Apollonius, 274.
 Orthodoxy, Jewish, 488, 493.
 Ostentation increasing, 106.
 Ostia, 573.
 Outposts, military, in Asia, etc., 304.
 Overbeck cited, 106-7, 110, 314, 335, 337, 339, 387 sq.
 Ovid, 237, 240, 247; the Ibis of, 251.
 Oxford compared to Alexandria, 194.

 PAGES, royal, 22.
 Painting, 108 sq., 386 sq.
 Palestine, 306.
 Pamphlets, 548, 556.

 Panætiæ visits Egypt with Scipio Æm., 503-4.
 Pancrates, dynast of Cibra, 540.
 Panion, battle of, 463, 531.
 Papyri, Greek, found in Egypt, 508.
 Paris, city of, 102 sq.
 Parmenides, 233.
 Parthenius, 247.
 Parthenon, the, 386.
 Parthia, rise of, 328, 517.
 Pastoral poetry of Theocritus, etc., 280 sq.
 Patriotism, Greek, 1-2, 14, 403; Polybius on, 529.
 Paul, St., cited, 140.
 Paullus, M. Æ., conqueror of Macedonia, 464, 563.
 Pausanias, Spartan king, 20.
 Pausanias, traveller, cited, 44, 91, 158-9, 197, 276.
 Peers, Macedonian, 21, 39.
 Peloponnesus, the, 297, 452.
 Peræa, the Rhodian, 331.
 Perdikkas, 34, 45.
 Pergamum, legends of, 93, 481; history of, 309 sq., 353; decrees at, 481.
 Peripatetic School, 133, 374; its encyclopædic tastes, 511.
 Peripoloi in Attica, 375.
 Persæus, the Stoic, 213, 357, 451, 456.
 Perseus, king of Macedon, 445, 456; his avarice, 524; his cowardice, 538.
 Persians, their policy in Asia Minor, 12; in Egypt, 171, 179; their wealth, 105.
 Personified cities, 111.
 Pessimism, 251, 273.
 Pe-tep, 177-8.
 Peter the Great, 18.
 Peukestas, 31, 44, 46.
 Phanocles, 243-4.
 Phaselis, 539.
 Phila, wife of Demetrius Poliorketes, 57, 69-70.
 Philetærus, governor of Pergamum, 309.
 Philetas, 242.
 Philip, a Roman prince, 60.
 Philip II., of Macedon, father of

- Alexander the Great, 5, 18, 29, 63 ;
his daughters, 65.
Philip III. (Arridæus), half-brother to Alexander, 34, 67-8.
Philip IV. was a son of Casander, and king of Macedon for a few months.
Philip V., 381, 386, 399 sq., 417 sq. ;
war with Rhodes, 433 ; his closing years, 523-4 ; and Abydos, 541 ; discussions with, 547 sq., 570
Philopœmen, his character, 441.
Philosophers, mission of the three,
to Rome, 571.
Philosophy and religion, 523 ; schools of, at Athens, 56, 131 sq., 371 sq.
Phocion, policy of, 4, 29, 529 ; death,
80 sq. ; his house at Athens, 106.
Phænomena of Aratus, 227 sq.
Phrygia, 41.
Phylarchus, 370, 394.
Pictures, 108, 563.
Pindar, 254-5, 258.
Piræus, 553.
Pirates, 332, 364.
Plagiarism, 219.
Plato, 131, 137, 243, 261, 528.
Platonists, 144 ; in Judæa, 483.
Plautus, 118 sq.
Pleiad, the, of Alexandrian poets, 278.
Pliny (the elder), quoted, 334, 388.
Plutarch's Lives quoted, viz.—Agés.
3 ; Alex. 17, 25, 44 ; Eum. 39, 309 ; Demetr. 42-3, 55-6, 64, 84
sq. ; Pyrr. 50, 417 ; Phoc. 77, 80 sq., 106 ; Arat. 213, 217, 302, 345, 399, 403 ; Agis, 295-7, 369 ;
Cleom. 370, 385, 393 ; Titus Fl., 443, 447 ; de exilio, 132 ; on crisis in the East, 392.
Poetry, Alexandrian, 225 sq. ; Latin borrowed from it, 226 ; confusion of kinds, ibid. ; its elegies, 235 sq. ;
lyrics, 253 ; bucolics, 279 sq.
Polemo, conversion of, 372.
Police, frontier, of Attica, 375, 377.
Policy of Demosthenes, 1-2 ; of Sparta, 3 ; of Hellenistic kings, 275.
Political animosity, 6 ; views of, 363
sq.
Polyaratus, the Rhodian, 539 sq.
Polybius, on rise of Achæan League,
7-8 ; on Macedonians, 19 ; on Egypt, 186, 197, 208 ; on the crisis of, 221 B.C., 392 ; on astronomy, 234 ; on Boeotian life, 301 ; on Elean life, 308 ; on Rhodes,
333, 341 sq., 454 ; on Byzantium, 347 sq., 351-2 ; on Prusias, 353 ;
on Ætolia, 367 ; on Cleomenes, 370 ; on education, 380, 388 ;
on Kynætha, 389 ; on music, ibid. ; on Philip V., 399 ; on diplomacy, 401 ; cited, 401-15 ; reflections of, 415, 418, 420 ; on Syrian policy, 436, 463 ; on the Ætolians, 440 ; his policy, 449 sq. ; on Eumenes II. and Rhodians, 454 ; sq. ; on Pergamum, ibid. ; on royal hostages at Rome, 460 ; on festival of Daphne, 465 sq. ; on Ptolemy Philometor, 498-9, 503 ;
on the Jews at Alexandria, 506, 513 ; his character, etc., 519-30 ;
on depopulation of Greece, 534
sq. ; on suicide, 538-41 ; on statue at Aliphera, 544 ; on secrecy in diplomacy, 547-9 ; on political liberty, 559 ; on sack of Corinth, 563 ; on a Roman snob, 567 ; on Roman honesty, ibid. ; on persistency of Roman interference, 570.
Polycrates, 499.
Polygamy of Macedonian kings, 23.
Polysperchon, 34, 58, 69, 78, 80 sq.
Popilius Lænas, embassy to Egypt,
464, 539.
Porphyry, 135.
Portraits, in marble and in colours,
109, 387.
Power, balance of, 152 sq.
Practical temper of Hellenism, 129.
Preachers, itinerant, in Hellenistic days, 373.
Presents from Hellenistic kings to Achæa, 551-2.
Priene, 345, 461.
Priests of Egypt, 175 ; chief of the Museum, 193.
Profile portraits, 109.

- Propertius, 241.
 Prose, a late vehicle of philosophy, 253.
 Protagoras, 134.
 Protogenes, painter, 57, 108, 338, 388.
 Providence, the divine, illustrated by fictitious history, 515; in Polybius, 525.
 Prusias II., King of Bithynia, 343, 352 sq., 526, 549.
 Psammetichus, 166.
 Psammis, 167.
 Ptolemais in Egypt, 181, 289, 385.
 Ptolemais in Palestine, 306, 473.
 Ptolemies, decay of, 459.
 Ptolemy I., son of Lagus, called Soter, 16, 34, 36, 45, 51, 161 sq., 191, 197; his decree, 176 sq.
 Ptolemy II., Philadelphus, accession, 199 sq.; festival of, 200 sq.; his mistresses, 204; policy, 205 sq., 256-7, 285-6, 288; character, 207, 257; eulogies of, 257-8, 282; relations to Aratus, 302, 357; to Jews, and his offerings at Jerusalem, 472.
 Ptolemy III., Euergetes I., 188, 256; his policy, 287, 324; campaigns, 318 sq.; decaying vigour, 325, 360, 426; treatment of Jews, 474 sq.
 Ptolemy IV., Philopator, 393 sq., 404 sq., 486-7, 497 sq.; death, 422.
 Ptolemy V., Epiphanes, accession, 422 sq.; national reaction under, 436 sq., 497 sq.
 Ptolemy VI., Philometor, 500-2, 524.
 Ptolemy VII., Physcon, or Euergetes II., 500, 503 sq.
 Ptolemy Keraunus, eldest son of Ptolemy I., 36, 53, 309.
 Punic War, the second, 393, 421.
 Puritanism anticipated by Stoics, 139-40.
 Purity of morals in Greek novels, 240, 274.
 Puteoli, 206.
 Pydna, effects of victory at, 464.
 Pyrrho of Elis, philosopher, 144.
 Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, 43; life of, 50 sq., 54-5.
- QUALITIES, moral, valued by Polybius, 523 sq.
 Quarrels, domestic, in the Hellenistic royal families, 23, 63, 319, 395.
 Quarrels, literary, at Alexandria, 219, 265 sq.
 Queens, their importance in this age, 63 sq.
 Question, the land, in Greece and Asia Minor, 325.
 Questions, moral, debated by Stoics, 139 sq., 372; by Epicureans, 143 sq.
 Quickness, a special feature commended in kings, 399.
 Quinctius, T., 446.
 Quintus Marcius Philippus, 345, 444-5.
 Quotations from classical historians rare in Polybius, 530.
- RACINE, 233.
 Rakotis, 183.
Rambles and Studies in Greece cited, 391.
 Ransom, variations in rate of, 472.
 Reaction of the East on Hellenism, 484 sq.
 Records, absence of official, at Rome, 570.
 Red Sea, 289, 304, 320.
 Regularity in Roman life, 566.
 Relativity of art, 273.
 Religion in Callimachus, 260-1; in Cleanthes, 261-2; Hellenistic, 386; at Rome, 526-7.
 Renaissance, the Italian, compared to age of Diadochi, 112, 207, 223, 388.
Republic, the, of Zeno, 140-1.
 Revillout, M., on demotic papyri, 173, 439, 486, 493.
 Rhetoric at Alexandria, 511; of Demetrius Phalereus, 530.
 Rhianus of Crete, 276, and Appendix C.
 Rhodes, 35, 57; foundation and early history of, 95 sq.; siege of, 96 sq.; subsequent history of, 330 sq.; naval power of, 332; purity of style, 339; earthquake at, etc.,

- 340 sq.; appealed to against Byzantium, 351 sq.; embassies at Rome, 454 sq.; treatment of, 457 sq., 539 sq.
 Rich and poor, 13.
 Romances, Greek, 238 sq.
 Romans and Pyrrhus, 52; and Philadelphus, 205; and Parthians, 328; and Rhodians, 333; admitted to rights of Hellenism, 359; and Greeks, 421, 449 sq.; policy of, 442, 457, 500, 542 sq., 574; described in First Macc., 442; their want of manners, 545-6; characteristics of, 566.
 Romantic opposed to classical, 223; voyages, 270.
 Rome, her steps of conquest in the East, 434.
Ropographi, 268.
 Rosetta stone, the, 436 sq.; abstract of, 438.
 Roxane, Queen, 27, 34, 59-60, 338.
 Rugby has absorbed surrounding country people, 307.
 Russians like Macedonians, 18.
Ryparographi, 388.
- SABBATH, Homer's supposed knowledge of, 514
 Sacrifices, Theophrastus's polemic against, 135.
 Sacrilege introduced by Galatians, 417.
 Sadducees, the, 482, 490.
 Salaries of artists, 378, 384-5.
 Samothrace, 107, 524.
 Sarapis, Zeus, 187.
 Sardis, 66, 397.
 Satyr, the resting, 338.
 Scarpheia, battle of, in Phocis, 568.
 Scepticism, 144, 373.
 Schliemann, Dr., 418.
 Schools of Athens, 145 sq., 371 sq.
 Schürer on History of Jews, cited, 467, 473, 514.
 Scipio Æmilianus in Egypt, 503-6, 520, 522, 566.
 Scipio Africanus, 534.
 Scipionic circle, the, 444, 565.
 Scopas the Ætolian, 423, 437.
 Sculpture at Sicyon, 301
 Scythopolis in Palestine, 306.
 Secrecy in diplomacy, 547-8.
 Seleucia on the Orontes, 211, 320.
 Seleucia on the Tigris, 470, 517.
 Seleucid Empire, 209, 460.
 Seleucids, decay of, 459.
 Seleucus I. (Nicator), King of Syria, 35-6, 210; character of, 44-6.
 Seleucus II. (Callinicus), King of Syria, 320, 325, 340.
 Seleucus III. (Philopator), King of Syria, 460, 488.
 Sellasia, battle of, 362.
 Semitic influences on Greeks, 211, 484, 490, 517; in architecture, 466; seriousness, 516.
 Senate, inefficiency of the Roman, in foreign affairs, 568 sq.
 Sentiment in politics, 403, 446.
Septuagint, the, 155, 183 sq., 471 sq.
 Sextus Empiricus, 335.
 Shah-name, the, 42.
 Shakespeare's Hamlet, 25; his Romeo and Orlando, 238-9.
 Shelley, 51.
 Ships, enormous, built for Ptolemy V., 486.
 Shorthouse, Mr., 271.
 Shuckburgh, Mr., his translation of Polybius, 341, 422 sq.
 Sibylline oracles forged by Jews, 514.
 Sicyon, 10, 69, 301 sq., 365.
 Signalling, Polybius's system of, 522.
Silli, of Timon of Phlius, 251, 253.
 Slaves in the New Comedy, 124.
Social Life in Greece cited, 50.
 Socialism, 452, 521.
 Socotora, 304.
 Sogdiana, its barons, 14, 30, 45.
 Solomon (see Wisdom).
 Sophocles, the decree of, 133.
 Sophocles the poet, 284, 336, 514.
 Sophron, commandant of Ephesus, 319.
 Sophron, mimes of, 221, 282.
 Sosibius, 395, 407, 409 sq., 422 sq.
 Sosus, a painter, 388.
 Sotades, 252; his metre, ibid.
 Soter, the title of, 161.
Soteria, the feast called, at Nicomedia, 353; at Delphi, 383.

- Sparta, policy of, towards Alexander, 3. 14 ; land of, 8 ; royalty of, 20 ; habits of, 29, 91, 292-3, 528 ; education at, 379-80 ; under Achæan League, 447 ; relations to the Jews, 481.
- Sphaerus, 498.
- Spitamenes, 45.
- Sports, field, preferred to athletics, 28.
- Stark, B., cited, 473.
- Stars known to Aratus the astronomer, 231.
- Statira, queen of Alexander, 34.
- Statues, honorary, 99 ; portrait, 248.
- Stilpo, 85.
- Stoic philosophy, 52 ; school, 148, 212, 375 ; its effects, 216, 240, 261, 371 sq. ; on Aratus, 233 ; on Pergamum, 311 ; on Polybius, 525 ; not prevalent at Alexandria, 511 ; on suicide, 537-8.
- Strabo cited, 163, 198, 207, 309, 317, 462.
- Stratocles, decree of, 56, 86.
- Students, Greek College, their condition, 380.
- Style, decay of literary, 114-5.
- Suez Canal compared to Bosphorus, 352.
- Suidas cited, 228.
- Summum bonum*, the, 139.
- Susa, 13.
- Swinburne, Mr., 265.
- Symonds, Mr. J. A., on the Anthology, 249.
- Sympathy, want of, in the Romans, 446.
- Syracuse, 298 sq., 561.
- Syria, 48, 209-11 ; war in, 404 sq. ; policy of, 435-6, 460 ; public feeling in, 542.
- System* used for a Federation, 366.
- Systems of philosophy modified by schools, 130, 372.
- TABLE, the, presented by Ptolemy Philadelphus to Jews, 472-3.
- Tacitus, 188, 328.
- Tanis, inscription of, 321 sq.
- Tarentum, 298.
- Tarsus, a seat of education, 379.
- Tauriskos of Tralles, 337.
- Taxes, farming of Jewish and Syrian, 474-5.
- Telephus, 93.
- Teles, the cynical preacher, 374.
- Temples, Egyptian, built by Ptolemies, 287, 321 ; Jewish, in Egypt, 501.
- Teniers school, the, 388.
- Tennyson, Lord, 255, 266.
- Teos, inscription of, on epheby, 377-8.
- Terence, 565, 574.
- Teuta, 358-9.
- Theatres, in Greece, 382 sq. ; at Rome, 565.
- Theocritus, 221, 224, 246 ; his lyrics, 255 ; Idylls, 266, 279 sq., 291, 299, 327-8.
- Theology, dogmatic, of the Stoics, 372 ; of Polybius, 526.
- Theon, the painter, 108.
- Theophrastus, cited, 112, 118, 133-4, 229 ; on piety, 135 ; will of, 147-8.
- Theos, title of Antiochus II., 310.
- Thermus, 367, 417, 440.
- Thessalonike, 65.
- Thrace, 77.
- Thracians, 348, 354.
- Thucydides, 71, 75.
- Tibœtes, 346, 354.
- Tigris, the, 288.
- Timoleon, 110.
- Timon of Phlius, 250 sq.
- Timotheus, 188.
- Tiresias, story of, 259.
- Titus (see Flamininus).
- Tlepolemus, 424 sq.
- Tombs, the early rifling of, 417-8.
- Toro Farnese*, the, 337 sq.
- Torr, Mr., his book on Rhodes, 330, 344.
- Torture, 537.
- Tourists, government by, 569.
- Towns (see Cities).
- Tracts, philosophical, 217-8.
- Trade, in Asia Minor, 10-11 ; Macedonian, 231 ; in Euxine, 348.
- Travelling, diffusion of, 557.

- Treason, 398.
 Treasures of art, their wanton destruction, 417.
 Triparadeisus, division of the empire at, 45.
 Turks, the, 158 ; their officers, 348.
 Tylis, kingdom of, 351, 354.
 Tyranny, Greek, 299, 365.
 Tyrants, conscientious, 129, 141, 303, 357, 365.
- UNDERGRADUATES, modern, compared to ephebi, 380.
 Union, the American, compared to Achæa, 369.
 Unionist politics in Greece, 449 sq.
 University of Alexandria, 192 sq. ; its decay, 507.
Unswept floor, the, of Sosus, 388.
 Uranopolis, 58.
 Urbanity, 327.
- VANDALISM (Galatism), 544 ; of Romans, 561-2.
Veneticus, the, of Dion, 327.
 Venice compared to Rhodes, 97, 333, and Appendix D.
 Venus, the Cnidian, 248.
 Vergil cited, 227, 244-5 ; his Dido, 272-3, 336.
 Vice-Roman, 567.
 Victor Emanuel compared to Ptolemy I., 191 ; to Antigonos Doson, 441.
 Virtue, Roman, 567 ; collapse of, 568.
 Voyages, wonderful, in Alexandrian literature, 239, 270.
- Vulso, C. Manlius, his campaign through Asia Minor, 464.
- WATERSPOUTS at Rhodes, 340.
 Wealth of Susa and Persepolis, 2 ; sudden increase of, in Achæa and Ætolia, 7 ; in Greece, 105.
 Wilamowitz von Möllendorf cited, 143, 145-6, 318.
 Williams, General (of Kars), 347.
 Winchester Coll., senior prefect of, compared to leader of ephebi, 380.
 Winter trading, 230.
 Wisdom, the book of, 483-4, 491, 515.
 Women, position of, in Egypt, 173-4.
 World-sadness in Euripides and the Alexandrians, 273.
 Wyse, Sir Thomas, his Travels, 301.
- XANTHIPPIUS (conqueror of Regulus) promoted in the East, 320.
 Xenocrates, 132, 144, 147, 372.
 Xenon, 451.
 Xenophon, 121, 270 ; the Cyropædia of, 516.
- ZENO, the Rhodian historian, 530 ; his mistakes, 531.
 Zeno, the Stoic philosopher, 301, 135, 137 sq., 371, 530-1.
 Zethus, 337.
 Zeus Hades (of Sinope), 187 ; Καταιβάτης, 298 ; of Arcadia, 527.
 Ziaélas, 346.
 Zoilus, 265.
 Zoological Gardens at Alexandria 202.

THE END.